1. Abstract

In recent years, using translation for teaching Chinese Language in Singapore has become a common and necessary strategy due to the growing trend of families using English Language as the primary language at home.

With increased use of translation, or the bilingual approach, in Chinese Language teaching, the issue of using suitable text also arises. This Capstone advocates the use of translated local literature as teaching materials and discusses the strategies involved in translating for pedagogical purposes.

Using a locally produced literature as an example, this Capstone experimented with the strategies and discusses key considerations in pedagogical translations as such selection of text, matching cognitive and language development of target readers, and manipulating text to showcase grammatical features or beautiful writing.

Specific translation strategies used in translating this Capstone for pedagogical purposes include manipulating the range of vocabulary to ensure the translation is age-appropriate, introducing specific grammatical elements in sentences to ensure there are ample learning opportunities, introducing metaphors and poetic expressions to encourage students to write better and pitching the translation at a suitable register which is age appropriate.

3. Commentary

3.1 Introduction

While educators in Singapore and abroad are more open to the bilingual approach in teaching Chinese, that is, to include an element of translation during teaching activities (MOE, 2010:34) due to the changing landscape of students in Singapore (MOE, 2010:11), the use of translated text as pedagogical materials is still not common as most of the existing curriculum do not contain translated articles (as shown in Appendix 1).

Educators who have used translated text generally find that these translations were not beautifully done and does not depict the authenticity of the Chinese Language (Shi, 2009). Therefore, there is a need to consider how materials used for teaching Chinese Language can be better translated not only to read authentically Chinese but also to fulfil the needs of Chinese teachers in Singapore.

This Capstone discusses the possible strategies that can be use when translating materials for pedagogical purposes. Using a locally produced literature, Chasing Merlion, as an example, this Capstone discusses some of the key factors a translator need to take note of when translating a teaching material for Primary 5 and 6 Singaporean students.

This Capstone will address the state of using translation in language pedagogy, the criticisms and support for using translated articles as pedagogical materials, the strategies required in pedagogical translation and translating specifically for Primary 5 and 6 students (that is, 11 to 12 years old), and specific issues involved in translating Chasing Merlion.

Chasing Merlion is chosen for this Capstone because it is a book written for young readers with a simple and straightforward narration easy for young readers to follow. It also showcased Singapore's history drawing references to places in Singapore in the early days (before Sang Nila Utama or Raffles' landing) and teaches positive values such as care for family and friends. These factors fulfil the overall education objectives of the Chinese Language curriculum in Singapore (MOE, 2015:8-9).

3.2 Translation in Language Pedagogy

The annual data of incoming Primary 1 students over the past twenty years noted that among ethnic Chinese students, the proportion with English as the most frequently used home language rose from 28% in 1991 to 50 % in 2004 (MOE, 2004:3), and further increased to 59% in 2010 (MOE, 2010:11). It was found that many students, in particular those from English-speaking backgrounds, face difficulty learning the language. About 77% of P6 students from English-speaking homes find learning Chinese difficult, compared to 50% and 36% of those who speak some or mostly Chinese at home respectively (MOE, 2004:6). Therefore, the Chinese Language Curriculum and Pedagogy Review Committee²³ in 2004 proposed a differentiated learning approach for students from different backgrounds. The Mother Tongue Languages Review Committee in 2010 (MOE, 2010:34) also encouraged teachers to tailor their teaching for students who learn Chinese as a second language and take advantage of a students' English Language facility to introduce new vocabulary in Chinese, that is, using translation to teach Chinese Language. But teachers must also help students to understand the differences in grammar rules and sentence structures between English and Chinese.

Prior to the recommendations, five schools in Singapore experimented using the bilingual approach to complement the teaching of Chinese Language between 2002 and 2003. The five schools are Anglo Chinese School (Primary), Methodist Girls' Primary School, St Andrew's Primary School, St Michael's Primary School and Anglo Chinese School (Baker). These schools were chosen as 66.96% to 95.8% of their students come from English-speaking homes.

The experimental teaching proved that the use of translation has been effective in helping students from English-speaking families and students with difficulties learning Chinese. Teachers interviewed said they saw improvement in students' performance and concluded the bilingual approach a successful teaching method (Lianhe Zaobao: 2009). Another seven schools introduced the method in their Chinese lessons in 2004. The Ministry of Education (MOE) subsequently allow schools to exercise the flexibility to use translation as a complementary teaching tool in Chinese lessons. This allowed schools to tailor the lessons per students' needs. Some of the key techniques were providing students with bilingual vocabulary lists and making use of computer software. Chinese remained the main language of instruction, English was used to supplement understanding of facts and content. As students could understand the lessons better, they also became more participative. The use of English decrease gradually as students progressed in their proficiency of Chinese. Teachers, interviewed, conveyed that the introduction of translation had helped students better understand the lesson taught.

The use of translation in language pedagogy is not a new topic, as early as the 18th century, the grammar-translation method was developed as a method of teaching modern languages in secondary schools in Prussia (Howatt 1984:131). This method, which mostly involved reading texts with the help of dictionaries and writing down a translation of the text, used translation into and out of the foreign language of individual sentences which are usually specifically constructed to demonstrate certain grammatical features (Howard 1984:132).

However, the Reform Movement, spearheaded by Sweet (1899/1964) and Jespersen (1901/1904), argued against the effectiveness of the grammar-translation method by pointing out the importance of connect texts in teaching and learning. Sweet and Jespersen considered that unless learners were given whole texts which correctly assembled the linguistic elements, they would not be able to form suitable connections in the new language (Howatt, 1984:169-179).

The Natural Method, Conversation Method, Direct Method, Communicative Approach which founded itself on the philosophy that: “Learning how to speak a new language ... is not a rational process which can be organized in a step-by-step manner” but an intuitive process added a further blow to the use of translation in language pedagogy (Howatt 1984:192).

In the 1990s, Duff and Newson continued to argue against it deeming translation as a non-communicative activity as it did not involve any oral interaction (Duff, 1994:5-7) and deprived teacher and learner of the opportunity to benefit from the accruing advantages of working within one language (Newson, 1998:63-64).

It was noted that language teachers themselves did not favour the use of translation because they felt that translation was largely text-bound and confined to only two of the four skills in language learning- namely reading and writing. (Duff 1994:5-7). As such, translation was deemed unsuitable for classroom as it was time-consuming and wasteful.

On the contrary, Stibbard (1998), Malmkjer (1998) and Leonardi (2010) argued that translation can be a useful tool in language pedagogy if it is applied within a principled theoretical framework where translation is aimed at helping learners develop communications strategies, oral fluency, and the skill of using the foreign language creatively (Stibbard, 1998:72), able to engage different language skills and allow students to deploy them simultaneously (Malmkjer, 1998:7-8), and has an integrated approach to help learners develop and strengthen their language skills (Leonardi, 2010:87). Na (2014) experimented using the Direct Translation method to help foreign students learn Chinese Language in China by allowing them to first understand the meaning of words when they learnt new words, phrases or sentences by finding the closest equivalent in their Mother Tongue.

Therefore, using translation in language pedagogy has its merits and demerits. In Singapore, it has proved to be an effective method for Chinese Language learners who primarily use English as the home language.

3.3 Using Translated Articles as Pedagogical Tools

The current set of curriculum for primary school Chinese (see full list in Appendix 1) contained a wide collection of articles specially written to meet the learning objectives in terms of language and holistic development. Most of these texts do not explicitly promote the bilingual approach in teaching Chinese nor are they translated articles from known writers.

As textbook alone is insufficient to develop students' reading ability, the Ministry of Education in Singapore noted that "more could be done to increase the provision of supplementary readers as well as to find creative ways to further cultivate the habit of reading MTL books among students" (MOE, 2010:69). Children are encouraged to tap on resources such as the National Library to supplement their reading. However, most of the Chinese titles²⁴ available in the National Library are not produced locally, thus children need to try to understand the social context in which the books are written while trying to understand the language. Hence, to ease the burden on students, I advocate translating local English stories so that Singaporean children can enjoy supplementary Chinese books written in age-appropriate language and a familiar culture.

The use of translated articles as pedagogical tools is not without controversy, among those who opposed the use of translated articles, Leonardi (2010:85) said authentic text written by native speakers for native speakers could help students better understand how the language is used in real-world context, and provide students with authentic exposure to language forms and uses. Tan (2014) said translated poetry and literary works are not suitable teaching materials as they are not composed in the mother tongue and do not conform to the norms of the language. Educators also felt that some of the translated articles found China's high school curriculum were badly translated, not only were the translated text not fluent, some of the expressions lacked an authenticity in Chinese (Shi, 2009).

Venuti (1996:331-332), however, argued that there is a value in using translated texts as it develops students to interpret the text and understand the historical context, a step beyond learning linguistics and grammatical functions. Venuti also noted that translated text are given as required readings because the foreign text they translate are valued highly.

As such, there is indeed value in introducing translated articles as pedagogical tools as language learning is not just about language functions, it should also be a door to learning different cultures, values and giving students a holistic view of the world they live in. The criticisms on translated articles point mainly to how they were translated and the skill or lack of the translator.

3.4 Translating for Pedagogical Purposes

(1) Selection of text

The selection of text is very important. Reading materials for children need to be age-appropriate, in terms of content and theme of story. Issues like sexuality, death and illness, family strife and divorce also needed to be handled with care (Landers, 2001:193-199). Translators also need to take of political correctness, content that can offend any racial, religious or ethnic groups should be avoided. (Lefevere, 1992:111-112).

In the Singapore context, besides language development, the Chinese curriculum also looks at developing these areas: 1) positive values to promote holistic development; 2) passion, appreciation and inculcation of Chinese culture; 3) general knowledge in life and understanding local culture; 4) care for the family, society, country and world; 5) having a global perspective and respect different cultures. Therefore, articles were not chosen solely based on the language forms and uses, articles with content showcasing Singapore's history and multicultural landscape, portraying good morals and values would also be selected.

Many local stories were considered in the process of preparing for this Capstone, including winning entries from the Singapore Literature Prize and works by well-known local authors such as Catherine Lim. However, many of the stories were not suitable for children because of the themes discussed, such as murder, gambling vices. Some with very good themes, such as the Singaporean identity, were too abstract for young readers. The selection of a suitable text was the most time-consuming activity in this Capstone.

As mentioned in the introduction, Chasing Merlion was chosen for this Capstone based on these factors: (1) The story does not touch on sensitive or controversial themes; (2) The language used in the source text is tailored for young readers, thus it is simple enough for them to understand and yet contain sufficient examples of metaphors and descriptive phrases to stretch their language proficiency; (3) Part of the setting of the story is based on actual Singapore history, and it is a good material to allow students to get to know early Singapore.

(2) Language Development of Target Readers

A translator should try to access the level of education of the reader (Newmark, 1998:13). The most common "error" among student translators was pitching the language in the wrong register. Knowing the readers and understanding their culture background will help translators decide on the degree of formality, generality (or specificity) and emotional tone they must express when they work on the text. More importantly, the translated texts must be written in a language that is immediately comprehensible to the readership (Newmark, 1998:42).

Language competency differs for children in different ages. The translator need to be mindful that children at different age groups have different language capabilities. Since one of the purposes of children's literature is to encourage or even teach children to read, the translator need to be mindful of how the target language is presented (Landers, 2001:193-199). In Singapore, the Ministry of Education has set different proficiency descriptors which describe more comprehensively what a learner can do with the language in real-life contexts. These descriptors help teachers tailor their teaching and classroom activities (MOE, 2010:47). A translator who intend to translate for Singaporean learners should consult this set of descriptors (MOE, 2015:11-26) and tailor his/her translation to meet the descriptors.

As the translated would be used in a language textbook, there is a need to ensure that the translation reads fluently in the target language and shows correct use of the target language grammar. In fact, it is not uncommon to have sentences that are specially constructed to illustrate the use of certain vocabulary or grammatical features. Therefore, the translator should also be familiar with the current syllabus.

3.5 Translating for 11-12 Years Old

This age group is chosen as the target readers as they can carry out mental actions on ideas and preposition without the need to rely on concrete objects (Pinter, 2010:10) and hence they will be able to understand the many metaphors in the source text. According to Piaget (from Pinter, 2010:10), 11 – 12 years old are able to reason by progressing from general ideas to specific ones by generating possibilities and hypotheses. In general, 11-12 years old are rational, systemic and abstract thinkers. A teacher working with this age group can introduce more sophisticated tasks such as debates, role plays, and various activities involving evaluating different opinions (Pinter, 2011:13). Learners at 11-12 years old can also appreciate linguistic challenges such as translation, or textual analysis. They should be able to evaluate their own and their peers' progress in learning and they may be able to negotiate learning content with teachers. Hence, a translator translating for 11-12 years old can introduce metaphors and abstract descriptions in the translation.

In terms of language development, children at 11-12 years old can add new words to their vocabulary when they are given a definition. They can also appreciate multiple meanings of words, mental metaphors, humour and puns, and develop the capability for abstract reasoning, understand non-literal meaning and irony (Berk, 2000, from Pinter, 2011:43). This is demonstrated in the translation by adding English translations of new vocabulary, using different strategies to translate metaphors, introducing idioms or idiomatic expressions whenever possible, and showcasing poetic expressions in descriptive passages.

To put into context for 11-12 years old Higher Chinese students in Singapore, they are required to be able to read 1800 to 1900 characters, understand the key messages in a passage, deduce the development of the story and forecast the ending, compare content of different passages, characters and viewpoints. They should also be able to summarise a passage and pick out themes, personalities and draw conclusions (MOE, 2015:5,16 and 20). In the translation of Chasing Merlion, careful attention was made to ensure that most of the words are within the recommended 1800 to 1900 words.

3.6 Translating Chasing Merlion

This section discusses specific examples in Chasing Merlion where the translation looked into such as (i) managing the range of vocabulary in the text through various strategies like replacing out-of-scope words with simpler ones with equivalent or close-enough meaning, using Hanyu Pinyin, English translations and footnotes to introduce new vocabulary, or omission; (ii) introducing grammatical features in sentences; (iii) translation of metaphors, (iv) translation of poetic expressions; (v) translation of names; (vi) register and (vii) ideology.

(1) Vocabulary

(i) Replacing out-of-scope words with equivalent or close meaning words

A conscious effort was made to restrict the vocabulary of the target text (TT) to the list of characters which are within the syllabus of Singapore's Higher Chinese at primary level. Students are expected to learn how to read 1800 to 1900 characters (full list in Appendix 2). This is to ensure that the language used in the target text is age-appropriate. Words that are beyond the syllabus were replaced with easier ones with equivalent or similar meaning, the list of examples below exemplify this translation strategy.

- In #6-9, "hill" should be translated as 山丘, however 丘 is not in the word list, thus hill was translated simply as 山 which can mean hill or mountain.
- Similarly in #10-11 "spring" should be translated as 溪, similar to the above example, it has to be replaced with a word with similar meaning. The only possible word within the word list is 河 which means river. As the meaning of the sentence is not significantly modified, it is deemed as an acceptable translation.
- In #29, "rough" is usually translated as 野蛮 or 粗鲁 in Chinese, however, as 蛮 and 鲁 are not in the vocabulary list, a more basic translation of 野 was used.
- In #34, "seaweed" should be translated as 海藻, however, 藻 is also not in the vocabulary list, a simpler alternative 海草 was chosen instead.

- In #52, “rumour” is usually translated as 谣言 but 谣 is not in the vocabulary list. Since there is no alternative within the list, the Chinese translation is rephrased as they heard someone is going to attack the people on the “Hill”. In this way, the implicit meaning of the source text is expressed explicitly in the target text. Students were not given the chance to practice the skill of inference but at least the translation has kept intact the message of the source text.
- In #64, the most obvious translation for “handsome” should be 英俊, however, 俊 is not in the vocabulary list. Other close alternatives such as 帅 is also not in the vocabulary list. As such, the rudimentary expression 好看 was chosen instead. This is not an ideal expression but the best that could be done within the limitation of the vocabulary list. The same strategy was deployed in #173.
- In #129, “lost his balance on the boat” should be translated as 站不稳, but as 稳 is not in the vocabulary list, the expression was translated as 差点跌入海里 which meant “almost fell into the sea”, the meaning of the sentence is modified but is considered an acceptable translation as it described the same state of motion. A similar translation was adopted in #133 as the standard translation for “to find balance” – 平衡 – is also not in the vocabulary list.
- In #164, “clasped his ears” should be translated as 捂住耳朵 but as 捂 is not in the vocabulary list, an easier alternative 按住 was used.
- In #310, the standard Chinese expression for producing rice alcohol should be 酿米酒, however, 酿 is not in the vocabulary list. A more elementary expression 做米酒 was opted to express the same action with simpler words.

(ii) Introduce new vocabulary with English translations

In the process of translation, it was determined that there were many expressions or words which were not in the vocabulary list but could not be replaced with words which are in the list. These were mainly names of places (#3, #34, #55, and #314), names of food (#18 and #19), names of items or animals (#16, #145, #177 and #199), nouns and noun phrases for people and actions (#128, #162, #170, #240, #295 and #297), and also description of scenery (#340) which are irreplaceable in the text. If they were to be replaced, it would change the context of the story. For these words and expressions, the translation strategy deployed was to provide Hanyu pinyin to help the students read these words, and footnotes to explain their meaning. The footnotes were mostly in English as this is a key technique used by MOE to educate students on new vocabulary, an education strategy also supported by Na (2014).

(iii) Omission of non-essential out-of-scope words

In several instances where the words which exceeded the students' command of vocabulary were non-essential and did not affect the context of the story, the strategy of omission was deployed. The examples were:

- #57, the Chinese expression for “aloe” was omitted, the translated text simply read a boy of similar age was seated under a tree.
- #58, the Chinese expression for “pickled” was omitted, the food was described as gourd.
- #88, the description of boats built from fir was omitted, the translation only described boats made from tropical trees.
- #199, the names of the two types of oysters cupping and bari were omitted, the translation read as two types of oysters.
- #210, the laundry list of weapons was omitted, the translation was simplified to carrying various weapons.
- #295, the description of how bezoar stones were formed was omitted in the main body of the translated text but mentioned in the footnotes.

(iv) Stretching Their Vocabulary

As the translated text is meant for pedagogical purposes, idioms were also intentionally placed in every 20 - 30 lines to stretch students' command of the target language but at the same kept most of the language simple enough for them to read without assistance. The list of idioms used in this translation were 相依为命(#1);云游四海(#13);无精打采(#24);耳熟能详 (#30);津津有味(#30);兴高采烈 (#40);漫无目的(#42);似懂非懂(#54 & #179);一模一样(#60);自力更生(#65);若有所思(#70);不为所动(#74);长夜破晓 (#79), 乘风破浪(#87);不愁吃不愁穿(#105);乌云密布 (#115), 危机重重(#116);一知半解(#124);自娱娱人 (#141);恍然大悟 (#159);鸡飞狗跳 (#162);异口同声(#209);满天飞舞 (#215);筋疲力尽 (#217);倾盆大雨(#221);气急败坏 (#232);命悬一线 (#241), 如鱼得水 (#244);无影无踪(#266);人如其名(#272);不省人事(#278);雨过天晴(#287);误打误撞

(#300); 蓄势待发(#301); 英雄无用武之地(#301); 习以为常(#303); 打起十二分精神(#323); 相交辉映 (#340); 眼花缭乱(#344) and 不可思议(#345).

(2) Grammar

As the text was translated for pedagogical purposes, the translator also tried to ensure that there were sentences which would allow teachers to illustrate certain grammar rules and for students to understand the correct use of the language. Some of the grammatical functions and structures featured were:

- The use of 把 to express the management or disposal of an object, some examples are #16, #100, #108, #125 and #170.
- The use of 被 to express the meaning of being subject to something, some examples are #118, #165, #172 and #321.
- The use of 对 to introduce persons or things related to the predicate, an example is #26.
- The use of 关于 in #1 to express the idea of in relation to something.
- The use of conjunctions like 但是(#64), 不过 (#169), 虽然(#31)and 然而(#250 and #287) to express adversative or transitional relations.
- The use of conjunctions like 因为(#17, #194, #215), 因此(#9, #22), 所以(#66) and 由于(#187) to express cause-effect relations.
- The use of 如果 (#188 and #200) to express hypothetical relations.
- The use of 为了(#133 and #265) to express causative relations.
- The use of 于是(#102 and #300) and 然后(#104) to express successive relations.
- The use of 好像(#286) and 似乎(#318) to make a metaphor.
- The use of 忽然(#72) and 突然(#162) to describe sudden occurrences. Teachers may also like to illustrate the similarities and differences between the two words.
- The use of adverbs such as 一直(#17), 本来(#21), 可是(#21), 从来(#22), 总是(#24), 只好(#32), 不得不(#34), 竟然(#160), 连忙(#164), 居然(#180), 赶紧(#230), 究竟(#235), and 特别(#342).

(3) Metaphor

According to Piaget and Pinter (Pinter, 2010: 11,13), students at 11 and 12 years old are able to understand metaphors. There are many instances of metaphors in Chasing Merlion and all of them are descriptive metaphors. There are generally two strategies deployed by most translators when translating metaphors – foreignization or domestication (Venuti, 1995). Peter Newmark gave some suggestions for translating metaphors (Newmark, 2001:88-91) which includes: (i) in the target language (TL) remaking the same picture, provided it has comparable frequency and currency in the appropriate TL register; (ii) Remaking the source language (SL) image with known another TL image, given it exists within the register; (iii) Remaking the metaphor by simile; (iv) keeping the metaphor and adding something else (v) changing the metaphor to sense; (vi) giving up the metaphor if it is too often used. Below is the discussion of the various strategies used when translating metaphors in Chasing Merlion.

(i) Remaking the same picture in TL

- #79: “like the break of dawn after a very long night” was translated literally as 长夜破晓, it is noted that in this instance the TL image remade the same picture in the SL.
- #217: “Sailors...fell off the vessels...like exhausted and lifeless torpedoes” was translated literally as 像一个个筋疲力尽没有生命力的鱼雷. The metaphor was basically kept intact with a slight addition that the torpedoes were falling one by one. There was no attempt to remake the image as “torpedoes” was the most appropriate metaphor given the setting of the scene – a war between pirates and trading vessels.

(ii) Remaking the SL image with known another TL image

- #70: the metaphor “like he was returning to a very long conversation with a friend only he himself could see” was remade into a Chinese phrase 千言万语竟在不言中 to allow the opportunity for the teacher to introduce some poetic expressions.
- #80: “the match that lit the tinder of Oak’s heart” was remade into another image in the TL, that is, a key to unlock Oak’s heart. In this example, it is noted that the TL image is a common metaphor used in the TL.

- #87: “‘dance with the waves’ – a seamen’s expression to describe the seaworthiness of a boat” was remade into a Chinese idiom 乘风破浪.
- #221: Rain coming down “in sheets” were remade into a Chinese idiom 倾盆大雨, a known image, familiar to the TL audience.
- #236: Similarly, the metaphor “poised like a statue” is remade into a known image in the TL 像石头一样一动也不动 which means motionless like a stone.
- #244: In this instance, the metaphor is also remade into a Chinese idiom 如鱼得水 which means like a fish in water.

(iii) Changing the metaphor to sense

- #69: the metaphor of “like he was studying an unfamiliar map without betraying either disgust or admiration” was changed to sense, the translation read as he took a hard look at his face, without betraying a sense of disgust or admiration.
- #177: the metaphor “all the time examining them like some extinct specimens stolen from a museum of sorts” was changed to sense, the translation read his eyes never lifted from them.

A possible pedagogical activity that educators can carry out is to ask students to think of other metaphors to describe the same image. That would be especially application to the images in #70, #80, #87, #221, #236 and #244. Pinter (2011:13) pointed out at students at 11-12 years old can appreciate linguistic challenges such as translation, or text analysis, and can evaluate their own and their peers’ choices of metaphors.

There was also instances where a metaphor not presented in the source text was introduced in the translation. One example was #216 where “many arrows rained down on the vessels” was translated as arrows fell like raindrops. Another example was #301 where “some appearing extremely eager to use their implements if only for a lack of opportunity” was translated into a Chinese idiomatic expression 英雄无用武之地 .

(4) Poetic Expressions

Higher Chinese students in Primary 5 and 6 are expected to be able to write complete sentences, narrate their story clearly and completely, and to write simple descriptive sentences (MOE, 2015:23). Therefore, a text translated for pedagogical purposes should strive to provide exemplary sentences or phrases for students to emulate. Below is a discussion of several examples in Chasing Merlion (#335 - #345).

- In #336, I have chosen an idiom 日出而作、日入而息 as the equivalent translation of Day was special for work and night was unique for sleep. Not only is the idiom equivalent in meaning as the original English sentence, it is taken out from a classical Chinese poem, this adds to the aesthetic appeal of the language used here. It is also an opportunity to educate students on classic poems and further their knowledge on Chinese culture which is a key learning objective in Chinese language teaching (MOE, 2015:9).
- In #340, I have chosen the idiom 相交辉映 to describe how the various hues and colours blend together in the palette formed by the black and blue skies. This idiom is not in the primary school syllabus but it is the most appropriate idiom to introduce in this context. Hence, it will be a good change to stretch their vocabulary.
- In #344 and #345, there was a vivid description of the noises made by the various animals and insects in the jungle. I have described the hallucinating cacophony of noises as a symphony in the night (眼花缭乱的乐章). I have borrowed an idiom which describes the sense of sight to describe sound to help readers picture in their mind how the different noises come together to form a picture.

(5) Register

There are various categories of register – e.g., non-technical or technical, informal or formal, urban or rural, standard or regional, jargon or non-jargon, vulgarity or propriety (Landers 2001:112). The translator needs to decide on the register which should ensure that the language is used appropriately in the culture in a specific situation (Lefevere, 1992:75). For Chasing Merlion, the register is set at an informal level to make the translation approachable for young readers. This is portrayed strongly in the dialogues between the characters where they spoke casually to one another. However, the register is not colloquial, neither was Singlish being used, as the text is meant to impart grammatically correct use of the target language. This strategy ensures that the target text is appropriate in terms of level of language proficiency for the target readers.

(6) Names

When translating the names in Chasing Merlion, the translator first needed to determine if the names contain any allusions that allows readers to characterize characters to a greater extend (Lefevere, 1992:39). Therefore, names of characters in the story were not transliterated but translated to reflect the character's persona.

- Wang comes from a relatively well-to-do family and he lives on the “Hill” inhabited by the local royalty, thus his name was translated as 旺仔 which means the prosperous boy.
- As for Oak, the image the name creates in the readers' mind is someone who is strong and independent like an oak tree. It would have been obvious to call him 橡。 However, taking into account that the character 橡 is not in the prescribed vocabulary list, it was replace with 树 which means tree.
- As for Tok, he is portrayed as a righteous pirate who hated violence and injustice. Therefore, he is given the name 义 which means righteousness. In #198 where his companion described him as someone who dislikes injustice, the word 义 was deliberately incorporated in the translation “有正义感的人” .
- Bayu is actually a name of Indonesian origin which means swift as wind. The meaning of his name was mentioned in #272. The shorter form of his name was given as “风”because in the early mentions, there was no explanation of what his name means. Only in #272, to match the source text's reference to what Bayu's name mean, the translator elaborated that his name was 流向风, which means he moves like the wind. However, to fit in with the Chinese naming conventions of having a family name, 流 was replaced with 刘 which is a common Chinese family name with the same pronunciation. This strategy ensures that the target text is firstly age-appropriate in terms of vocabulary and at the same time stretches students' ability to make associations.

As for the names of places like Temasek, Timor, Dragon Tooth Gate, China, Fujian, etc, the translator has opted for known existing translations, as these were actual places in real life and in the story. In the preface of the book (not translated), the author did mention that that story is a cross between history and fiction, thus the translator has decided to stick to existing translations of real places for the above-mentioned place. But, for certain places such as "Hill", "River" and "Island", the translator kept the form in the TL, as the names of these places, namely Fort Caning Hill, Singapore River and Sentosa were not established in the timeline of the story.

(7) Ideology

Earlier, it was mentioned that translators need to pay careful attention to ensure that the target text maintains political correctness and content that are capable of offending any racial, religious or ethnic groups and issues like sexuality, death and illness, family strife and divorce should be either avoided or handled with care. It is noted that as Chasing Merlion was targeted for young readers, such contentious content were not presented in the source text. That was a main reason for selecting this source text. There was no need to pay special attention to the ideology in the targeted text.

3.7 Suggestions for further research

The above are my recommendations for translators who wish to translate for pedagogical purposes. Further research can be done to derive a more comprehensive set of recommendations. Some suggestions are as below.

(1) Reader Response Survey with Target Readers

As the translated article in this Capstone can act as a supplementary reading material for learners, it is crucial that the readers actually enjoy reading it. A way of gauging their interest is to conduct a reader response survey. Taking reference from the Reader Response Theory that focuses on the reader and their experience of a literary work, a translator can also test the reader responses by doing a survey with a random sample of target readers.

Some of the questions could include:

- Rate how much do you like the story?
- Rate how much do you like the way the story is written?
- Rate how much has this story helped improved your writing skills?
- The use of English translation helped me understand new vocabulary. Agree or Disagree.

With the results collected from the children, further edits can be made to make the story more appealing and more targeted in terms of teaching them good writing skills.

(2) Experimental Teaching with Target Readers

Another possible research idea involved conducting experimental teaching with the translated text. As the translated article can be used for language teaching in the classroom, a random sample of teachers could be selected to test carrying out actual teaching with the translated text.

Teachers can then complete an evaluation to rate how the translated text fulfil their teaching objectives, the age-appropriateness of the text, comment on whether they will use the text in the classroom and suggest areas for improvement.

3.8 Conclusion

In contemporary language pedagogy, the use of translation serve certain purposes. This is especially important when learners are learning a foreign or second language. In Singapore, where more and more students come from English speaking homes, the use of translation allows for them to grasp Chinese Language faster in the classroom.

On the use of translated articles in language pedagogy, while some scholars value the introduction of foreign culture, mindset, others criticise the badly translated articles. Essentially an article used for language instruction should be well translated to showcase the beauty of the target language and to fulfil learning and teaching objectives.

Thus, it is important for translators to exercise special care in doing pedagogical translation. The selection of the text is crucial as it should not contain politically incorrect, racial and religiously sensitive information, also it should trend cautiously on issues on morals, sexuality, etc.

In the translation process, they need to be mindful of the cognitive and language development of the target readers. Extensive research needs to be done to determine readers' language acquisition level and learning outcomes.

The translated text should be carefully manipulated, through means such as replacing words that are beyond their level of comprehension, providing footnotes and pronunciation guides when necessary, sentences must be carefully constructed to illustrate specific grammatical structures and to teach students to write beautifully. Translators should also be familiar with pedagogical methods so that they have in mind how teachers would teach the passage and even provide pedagogical suggestions when possible.

A good pedagogical translation should not only function as an instructional material for classroom teaching, it should also be a pleasant read which would encourage students to pursue further interest in learning the language.

Dear Philip,

We have spoken about translating your book for my Master's Capstone.

I'm writing to seek your permission officially.

I am a MA student in Translation and Interpretation at Nanyang Technological University. As part of my studies, I would like to produce an English-to-Chinese translation project, involving my translation of page 1- 16 of your book Chasing Merlion.

As far as I know, this has not yet been translated into Chinese. Could I ask you for permission to use these pages in my translation project? The project is for academic purposes only. My final work will generate a research paper, which will be submitted for assessment in the following format: original-text extract, my translation, and my academic analysis and discussion. After assessment by NTU faculty, it will be catalogued by NTU library and become accessible to NTU staff and students.

I will acknowledge your permission in my translation project. Unless you have a preferred wording, I propose: "The source text is reproduced by kind permission of Philip Ng, who also gave me permission to produce the translated version".

I look forward to your reply. Many thanks in advance.

Yours sincerely,

Semay
