The recently-concluded "Symposium on Communication Theory: The Asian Perspective", held at Thammasat University, Bangkok, was an enlightening attempt at assessing the relevance and applicability of Western communication theory to the Asian situation.

Of the papers presented at the symposium, some made honest, sincere attempts to define communication theories and proposed specific action to indigenize them to suit Asian cultures; others described the constraints in operationalizing the principles of Western theories in multi-ethnic, pluralistic societies in Asia; others focused on specific characteristics of particular Asian cultures and how they may be used to re-think the assumptions and hypotheses of established communication models and theories; still, others described the role of religion and power politics in communication processes and behaviour in Asia.

The focus, treatment, and quality of scholarship of the papers varied greatly. So did the discussions that followed.

On the whole, however, the symposium was instructive and enlightening. It provided very useful insights on the perceptions of Western communication theory among Asian communication scholars and practitioners. It is probable that the participants, especially the academics and researchers, may have been stimulated enough to pursue some of the directions and implications resulting from the symposium. Among others, the serious thinking and re-thinking on the place of Western communication theory in Asian communication research, scholarship, and media practice.

The symposium papers and discussions pointed out that Western communication theory has a rightful place in Asian communication education, research, and media practice. It need not be discarded in favor of narrow-minded chauvinism. What is needed is an objective evaluation of its potentials in generating knowledge and insights; a flexibility and innovativeness to be able to modify or adapt its parameters to local situations; and a heightened creativity to use Asian communication processes, behaviour patterns, and experiences for enriching Western-oriented theories, as well as for developing new and Asian-originated communication models and theories.

The task at hand is to harness suitable individuals and institutions who should take the lead in this direction. Researchers, academics, and extension professionals should be identified and encouraged to undertake studies that will test further, the applicability of Western theoretical assumptions in the context of Asia, as well as the validity of emerging Asian communication models and constructs not only in their own local milieu but also in non-Asian locales. Such effort is necessary to ensure that the good start made at the recent symposium is pursued to its rightful conclusion.

The summary of proceedings, programme of activities, resource papers, discussion reports and other pertinent papers of the symposium are contained in the following pages.

Grateful acknowledgement is due to the World Association for Christian Communication (WACC) for its financial support to make this symposium possible.
