<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Roots of Radical Sunni Traditionalism Fear of Reason and the Hashwiyah</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Author(s)</td>
<td>Karim Douglas, C.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Date</td>
<td>2008</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>URL</td>
<td>http://hdl.handle.net/10220/40154</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rights</td>
<td>Nanyang Technological University</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Roots of Radical Sunni Traditionalism
Fear of Reason and the Hāshwiyyah

Karim Douglas Crow

S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies
Singapore

7 May 2008

With Compliments

This Working Paper series presents papers in a preliminary form and serves to stimulate comment and discussion. The views expressed are entirely the author’s own and not that of the S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies.
The S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies (RSIS) was established in January 2007 as an autonomous School within the Nanyang Technological University. RSIS’s mission is to be a leading research and graduate teaching institution in strategic and international affairs in the Asia Pacific. To accomplish this mission, it will:

- Provide a rigorous professional graduate education in international affairs with a strong practical and area emphasis
- Conduct policy-relevant research in national security, defence and strategic studies, diplomacy and international relations
- Collaborate with like-minded schools of international affairs to form a global network of excellence

Graduate Training in International Affairs

RSIS offers an exacting graduate education in international affairs, taught by an international faculty of leading thinkers and practitioners. The teaching programme consists of the Master of Science (MSc) degrees in Strategic Studies, International Relations, International Political Economy, and Asian Studies as well as an MBA in International Studies taught jointly with the Nanyang Business School. The graduate teaching is distinguished by their focus on the Asia Pacific, the professional practice of international affairs, and the cultivation of academic depth. Over 150 students, the majority from abroad, are enrolled with the School. A small and select Ph.D. programme caters to advanced students whose interests match those of specific faculty members.

Research

RSIS research is conducted by five constituent Institutes and Centres: the Institute of Defence and Strategic Studies (IDSS, founded 1996), the International Centre for Political Violence and Terrorism Research (ICPVTR, 2002), the Centre of Excellence for National Security (CENS, 2006), the Centre for the Advanced Study of Regionalism and Multilateralism (CASRM, 2007); and the Consortium of Non-Traditional Security Studies in ASIA (NTS-Asia, 2007). The focus of research is on issues relating to the security and stability of the Asia-Pacific region and their implications for Singapore and other countries in the region. The School has three professorships that bring distinguished scholars and practitioners to teach and to do research at the School. They are the S. Rajaratnam Professorship in Strategic Studies, the Ngee Ann Kongsi Professorship in International Relations, and the NTUC Professorship in International Economic Relations.

International Collaboration

Collaboration with other professional Schools of international affairs to form a global network of excellence is a RSIS priority. RSIS will initiate links with other like-minded schools so as to enrich its research and teaching activities as well as adopt the best practices of successful schools.
ABSTRACT

Roots of Radical Sunni Traditionalism
Fear of Reason and the Ḥashwiyah *

Any positive forward-moving progress within Muslim societies necessitates the negative task of uncovering and dissipating obstacles to progress. An overview of the historical development of radical Sunni Traditionalism summarizing its chief doctrinal preoccupations and motives, affords a deeper understanding of the contemporary dilemma facing Muslims. The Ḥashwiyah [ignoramuses] were literalists who apprehended merely the surface meaning of words and concepts. They represented an orientation with a core doctrinal basis centred in Ḥanbalite Traditionalism whose law and creed were anchored in a narrow textualism with anthropomorphic and determinist views. Research into the Ḥashwiyah’s doctrinal intolerance, hostility to rationalism, and mob tactics reveals the hallmark of deformist Islam. Contemporary Saudi Ḥanbalite religious ideology exhibits definite characteristics rooted in the ancient Ḥashwiyah worldview. Despite the small numerical and geographical footprint of Ḥanbalism today, the current amplification of a Ḥashwiyah-like mentality makes a deep imprint by virtue of its trans-national ubiquity.

* While this study employs Arabic terms and concepts, we provide basic context and sufficient orientation as to be intelligible to novices in the study of Islam. It is part of a broader investigation into historical and ideological roots of religious teachings that have direct bearing on the global spread of bloodshed and militarism.

*************************

Dr. Karim Douglas Crow has taught Arabic and Islamic Studies in the U.S.A. at Columbia, Fordham, and New York Universities, the Universities of Virginia, and Maryland; as well as in Kuala Lumpur at the International Institute of Islamic Thought & Civilization (ISTAC). He is currently Associate Professor (Contemporary Islam) at the S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies, Nanyang Technological University in Singapore. He serves as an Advisor for several non-governmental projects on Islamic peace in the Caucasus, Middle East, and S.E.Asia. He has written ‘When God Created Wisdom’: Islamic Aql Creation Narratives; edited a volume on the Sunni–Shi‘ah schism Facing One Qiblah; and is presently working on an historical survey of Islamic rationalities, and a study of the life and teachings of imam Ja‘far al-Sadiq (d. 148 H/ 765).
Roots of Radical Sunni Traditionalism
Fear of Reason and the Hāshwiyah

“The Apparent is the bridge to the Real [al-majāzu qantāratu l-ḥaqiqa].’”
(Traditional Sufi saying, also attributed to the Prophet Muhammad)

Introduction
Historically, Islam embodied a forward movement of the human spirit manifesting a creative cultural and intellectual endeavour that directly contributed to the rise of Europe and modernity. A remarkable feature of Islamic civilization was its successful integration of the widest range of diverse ethno-linguistic groups upon a higher rational plane than preceding civilizations had accomplished—reaching from Iberian and Balkan to Chinese and Indonesian. Over much of its first millennium, Islamic societies exhibited dynamism and a tolerant pluralism fuelled by its wellsprings of creative energy: the spiritual and intellectual resources of its revealed guidance. The eclipse of their former power and glory has yet to be adequately dealt with today by Muslims, who find themselves increasingly marginalized or disempowered in our globalized context.

Today, when Muslims think and speak of ‘Islam’ there is a noticeable tendency to objectify this religious-cultural-ideological legacy in terms of an invariable monolithic reality. This is especially evident when Muslims discourse about this legacy in the presence of non-Muslims. Undoubtedly, there is a level where this type of conceptualization operates in a valid manner, just as when others discourse about the essential principles or worldviews of Christianity or Buddhism, for example. Yet all of us need to be reminded of the great variation exemplified among differing Muslim societies, or even within one given society. Often, what one hears of Muslims asserting with regard to “Islam” reflects more their own specific cultural or regional Muslim reality than an unchanging Islamic ideal. Nevertheless, Muslims frequently conceive of Islam as a continuous presence remaining as normatively valid today as it was over one thousand four hundred years ago. One reason for this mode of thinking and speaking may be traced back to the early formation of the distinctive styles of Muslim “salvation history” elaborated for politico-religious legitimization and community self-definition. Just as Americans often tend to “objectify” their own national identity with reference to the U.S. Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, Muslims have recourse to their sacred texts (Qur’an and Prophetic Hadith) and their foundational narratives of providential origin and worldly empire.¹ Josef Van Ess points out: “That sort of backward-looking utopian thought is fairly common. In 19th century Europe, it took the form of nationalism; there too, a mythical past was constructed in an effort to forge an identity, and that mythical past was reconstituted through a slanted reading of the historical texts. For Muslims, a further element has been added—namely, revelation, which marks the beginning of historical reality and therefore forms an indelible part of the utopia.”²

Islam is intolerant of idolatry or worship of concrete images representing Divinity. This religion elevated the word above the image. The word is a tangible sensory form conveying meaning; language points to meaning and discloses significance. Thus, Arabic calligraphy became its pre-eminent art form and mode of symbolic representation. But such disclosure requires the minds of humans to be prepared and capable to conceive and grasp meaning, to heed the indications or pointers words provide and thereby penetrate to their intended significances. The identity or non-identity of name and thing-named was intensively discussed among Muslim speculative theologians [mutakallimu’n], while legalist-oriented Traditionalists avoided the topic as a reprehensible-innovation [bid’ah]. This issue was often cast in the polarity of ‘ism and ma’na [name and concept], where proper comprehension elevates the “concept-meaning” above its “name”. The gist is captured in an utterance by the reputable early thinker Ja’far al-Sādiq (d. 148 H/765 C.E.):³

“...the name is other than what-is-named, so whomever worships the name disregarding the concept [ma’na] commits unfaith [kufr] and he worships nothing, and whomever worships the name and the concept commits unfaith by worshipping Two, and whomever worships the concept disregarding the name—now that is true ‘oneness’[tawḥiḍ]....”

¹ For a good typological treatment of this topic see Donner, Narratives of Islamic Origins.
² Van Ess, Flowering of Muslim Theology, p. 117.
³ al-Kulaynī, al-Usull min al-Kafi, ed. al-Ghafter, 3rd ed., Tehran, 1388) 1 k. al-Tawḥiḍ, ba‘b al-ma’buḍ, p. 87 §2. Al-Shāfi‘i (d. 204 H) said: “When you hear someone say that the name is different from the thing named or the name is identical with the thing named, testify against him that he is a Mutakallim and has no religion”; cited in Rosenthal, General Introduction, p. 127 n.432.
Compare more conceptually elaborated remarks by Abu Hamid al-Ghazali (d. 505/1111) on three types of existence for the name, the act of naming, and the named:

“...existence as individuals is the fundamental and real existence, while existence in the mind is cognitive formal existence, and existence in speech is verbal and indicative. ... So the word, the knowledge, and the object known are three distinct things, though they mutually conform and correspond, and are sometimes confused by the dull-witted...”

Thus, to halt at the outer form of the literal word and fail to grasp the intended disclosure of meaning would be akin to idolatry. The persistent orientation among Muslims known historically as the Ḥāshwiyyah did precisely that. The current reappearance of a Ḥāshwiyyah-like mindset within sectors of Muslim societies poses a genuine threat to the potential of Muslims to deal adequately in a forward-looking manner with the challenges confronting their societies.

To better comprehend the magnitude of this threat facing Muslims and the backward-looking detour that segments of their societies have strayed down, we review historically the relatively obscure trend known as the Ḥāshwiyyah. This anti-intellectual tendency was marked by an uncompromising dogmatism suspicious of rationality and the symbolic imagination, as well as by hostility towards much of the higher intellectual or spiritual realms of Islamic civilization. It denied the value of legitimate interpretations and the openness of religious texts and symbols to a hierarchy of readings or seizures of meaning. It has recently received renewed impetus through the ubiquitous influence of a deformist neo-Wahhabi mentality. Abo El Fadl observes, “the impact of puritans on the Islamic intellectual heritage, and on the humanistic and universalistic orientations within Islam, has been nothing short of devastating.” We hope this overview assists the cultivation of a critical attitude

---

5 A good overview of this contemporary puritanical trend is provided by Abo El Fadl, The Great Theft: Wrestling Islam from the Extremists. For the epistemic basis of neo-Wahhabism, see our ‘‘Kalashnikov Islam’ and the Deformist Mentality,” presented at the International Conference On Dialogue of Civilizations and the Construction of Peace, Centre for Civilisational Dialogue (Universiti Malaya) & Oxford Centre for Islamic Studies, 26–27 March 2005.

6 The Great Theft, p. 100.
to the legacy of the past coupled with a creatively adequate response to present needs and conditions, enabling Muslims to recapture their forward-moving spirit.

Interpreting the Text

Once the leading Sufi master of the great city of Niṣapur in Northeast Iran and subtle Ash'arite Qur’anic commentator Abu'l-Qasim ‘Abd al-Karim al-Qushayri (d. 465/1072) visited the capital of the empire Baghdad where he convened a session of dhikr [mystic remembrance] attended by both masses and elite. When the professional reciter reached the Qur’anic verse (Q Tā-Ha 20:5) “The All Merciful Who is established [istawa] upon the Throne”, the Traditionalist Ḥanbalis among the audience rose up in an unruly throng chanting “HE is Sitting! Sitting!” provoking a riot against the disciples of the great Sufi which was not defused till a number of persons were killed and caliphal police were forced to intervene to quell the disturbance. (This event, typical of Baghdadi Ḥanbalite fanaticism with its unruly violence, is placed into historical context below.) The image of God seated upon His Throne, and related issues of divine attributes evoking anthropomorphic qualities (Hand, Face, Speech, descent) spoken of in revelation, as well as the physical visibility of God in the Hereafter—or even in this world—spoken of in Prophetic traditions, were subject to intense polemics among Muslims from an early period. Indeed, strictly literalist Traditionalists, whose centre of gravity in early centuries were the Ḥanbali jurists, upheld their epistemological doctrine of “bi-la-kayf [Without Asking How]” regarding the imagery and language of revelation, even debating among themselves whether the Divine Being experiences mumassah [physical contact] when HE sits upon the Throne, and whether the Throne creaks or emits a 7 See the vivid account by the Maḥkite magistrate from Seville, Aḥmad b. ‘Abdallāh b. Ḥabīb al-‘Awaṣṣim min al-Qawaṣṣim, p. 209; his work is an extended polemic reflecting Traditionalist hostility against over-rationalizing trends of Philosophy and Shi‘ism.

8 By Traditionalists, we denote the informal guild of professional Hadith tradents joined by their commitment to Sunni dogmatic orthodoxy [ṣaḥīh sunnah] which arose in the 2nd/8th century and achieved definite consolidation during the course of the 3rd/9th century. Also known as Aḥl al-Hadith [Hadith Folk], this influential trend laid the basis for normative Sunni creed and jurisprudence. We use “traditionists” or “tradents” to denote any person narrating hadith or transmitting aḥbār reports whether they belong to the Hadith Folk, or to rival schools of rationalist jurists [Aḥl al-Ra‘y], historians, ascetic-mystics, early Shi‘ah groupings, etc.
sound under the burden of His weight. They spurned the linguistic arguments of rationalist-oriented linguists and theologians who taught that such revealed imagery should be understood as straightforward metaphoric speech [majaz]—just as in poetry—e.g. God’s “Hand” connotes His “Power” while Throne signifies His transcendence.

But the radical Traditionalists saw only the outward letters with a flat surface understanding. A tale is told of an encounter between the famous Basran Mu’tazilite thinker Abu-Hudhayl (d. 227/841?) with a Traditionalist who wrote the word Allah on a tablet asking, “Do you deny this word is ‘God’—thereby rejecting what is perceived by your senses?” Abu-Hudhayl wrote a second Allah beside the first word asking him ironically, “which God?!” This anecdote captures the familiar feature of the Hâshwiyyah mode of comprehending the revealed word and divinity literally. Rationalist Mu’tazilite thinkers who functioned as intellectual catalysts, along with the strong emphasis on independent reasoning techniques practiced among early Iraqi legal scholars, posed a distinct challenge to Traditionalists. Qur’anic verses such as “The All Merciful Who is established [sits upright] upon the Throne” provoked attempts by early authorities to explain in what manner God sits upon or mounts [istiwa] His Throne. A response by the leading 2nd/8th century Madinan jurist Malik b. Anas (d. 179/795) was often cited: “The istiwa is something known (in language), but the ‘how’ is unknown (i.e. specifying the mode of sitting is unknown to us), while faith in it is obligatory, and questioning about this is a reprehensible-innovation [bid’ah].” It was commonly held that many early pious forebears [salaf] (e.g. Sa’id b. al-Musayyab d.94 H, al-Sha’bi d.103, or Sufyan al-Thawri d.161) had affirmed faith in such revealed language yet discouraged others from offering figurative-interpretations [ta’wi] that may yield innovations.

---

9 See e.g. al-Shahrastani> al-Milal wa l-Nihal I, pp. 105–8 on die-hard anthropomorphists [mushabbihat al-hâshwiyyah]. For general orientation, see comments by ‘Abdulla> bin Hâmid ‘Ali in his Intro. & Appendix II of his transl. of Ibn al-Jawzi> The Attributes of God, pp. 5–19, 125–151.
10 Mankdîm, Ta’liq Sharh al-Usûl al-Khamsah, p. 544.
11 Shahrastani> Milal pp. 103–5: the salaf among ashâb al-hadîth (including Malik b. Anas & Ibn Hînbal) abjured the ta’wi of verses and transmitted reports with anthropomorphic imagery; they accepted them but refrained from explaining their meaning (‘halting’[tawqi’]), since this was not required or necessary for proper faith in their era, and provided safety from wrong innovations. In Shahrastani’s view, their position was not true tashbih [anthropomorphist-resembling]. Haytami> Fatawa, pp. 151 & p. 201: “the difference between the (early) salaf and the (later) khalaf lies in ‘detailed explanation [ta’wi tafsîr], for the salaf gave preference to primacy of refraining from it not being in need of it due to the uprightness of their era, while the khalaf [later generations] discussions concerning the physical imagery of revealed language, reinforced by popular notions that God is located ‘above’ (fawq) or inhabits a certain physical “direction” (jihah) a definite trajectory unfolded known as the Mushabbihah centred in radical Traditionalism. “Resemblance” [tashbih] connotes conceiving of God in comparable human terms—anthropomorphism; its contrary is tanzih or elevating the transcendent God totally above all semblances or parallels, in keeping with the explicit statement of revelation (Q 42:11): There is nothing like Him; and He is the All-Hearing the All-Seeing.

From a very early period, linguists, grammarians and rationalist litterateurs asserted the relevance of metaphoric language [majaż] and literary symbolism not only for interpreting Scripture but also for expressions of meaning in a variety of disciplines. This controversy about the admissibility of metaphor and symbol when comprehending the language of revelation took shape in the famed debate over real-literal meaning versus metaphoric signification (the ḥaqiqah–majaż dichotomy). Rationalist intellectuals who, for a brief period of fifteen years under the Inquisition or Mihraj from 218–234 H/833–848 C.E., sought to impose their ideas as orthodox doctrine with state support under the seventh Abbaşid Caliph al-Mamūn (d. 218/833) and his three immediate successors, strongly upheld the validity of majaż or metaphoric interpretation. This issue became a standard part of theological discourse and polemics—particularly concerning the very nature of the sacred Qur’ān as divine Speech: whether His “Word” is increate and eternal, or temporally created-in-time and thus finite. The first officially sponsored major theological school of the Mu’tazilah, “for at least a century...the intellectual ‘orthodoxy’ of their time”¹³ held that to admit increate attributes such as Speech [kalam] alongside the divine essence could lead to the error of Christians who spoke of three divinities

¹² Ma’mūn was committed to intellectual pursuits and patronized both Mu’tazilite thinkers as well as early scientific & philosophical activities including the circle around the philosopher al-Kindī (d. 256 H); he established the Academy of Wisdom [Dar al-Hikmah] in Baghdad where the Hellenic, Syrian & Indian sciences were collected and translated.

¹³ Van Ess, Flowering of Muslim Theology, p. 10.
Yet the leading Traditionalist-jurist Ahmad Ibn Hanbal (d. 241/855), eponym of the Hanbali legal rite (one of four surviving Sunni law schools), insisted that as divine Speech the Qur’an was uncreated and pre-existent. He was one of a very few religious scholars who did not bend to coercion by ‘Abbasid caliphs to affirm the created nature of Qur’an as God’s Speech despite torture and imprisonment. Ibn Hanbal thereby became the darling of the masses who increasingly began to champion the anti-rationalist dogma of Traditionalists in the consolidation of the majority group of Muslims, the Ahl al-Sunnah wa l-Jama’ah [People of the Tradition and Majority Assembly] (also termed Ahl al-Hadith wa l-Sunnah). In a wider sense, the Inquisition was about the role of reason in interpreting divine texts.

I. Reason and Revelation

Throughout Islamic thought and experience, there has existed a tension between revealed givens mediated in Scripture and Prophetic narratives (Qur’an and Hadith) and rationalist patterns of thought and meaning. The Hanbali juridical school always harboured a die-hard Traditionalist wing that actively opposed rationalizing and semi-rationalist currents, particularly those new-fangled ideas imported by circles in creative engagement with Hellenic ideas that reached early Islam under the ‘Abbasid Caliphs from remaining centres of Alexandrian, pagan Harranian, and Syriac Christian schools in the East. These disciplines termed “the knowledge of the ancients [‘ilm al-awa’il]” included medicine, astronomy, cosmology, mathematics, engineering, the physical sciences..., and were often deemed suspect primarily for being non-prophetic in origin and methodology. Yet their utility was appreciated early on by Muslim intelligentsia and the rulers who sponsored their efforts at collection and recovery. The assessment of this creative tension over the priority and weight to be awarded to rationality and philosophy—or philosophically impregnated systems of thought including later speculative Theology, Legal Theory, and Sufi metaphysics—has varied widely both among Muslims and Western students of 14 God’s Messenger Jesus son of Mary (upon him peace), while referred to in the Qur’an as God’s Word [kalimah] and Spirit [ruh], is not conceived as pre-existent nor divine. Like the early Jewish-Christians of the first Jerusalem church and Ebionites of trans-Jordan and Parapotamia, Islam teaches that Jesus was human, was immaculately conceived by the virgin Mary, and was raised alive bodily to heaven from the cross.

Islamic thought. It remains true till our own day that Muslims very frequently privilege the normative juristic discourse and categories of the Law [shari‘ah], namely positive law or jurisprudence [fiqh], over other historically equally significant modes of conceptual discourse that contain resources for a more adequate response to changing cultural conditions imposed by modernity within the wide variety of Muslim societies in our global reality.

The first major manifestation of this tension arose in the course of the 2nd/8th century between strict Traditionalists or Ḥadith Folk [Ahl al-Ḥadīth] who confined legal “knowledge” to sacred texts (revealed Qur‘an and Ḥadīth narrations), and the rationalist jurists or Ahl al-Ra‘y based mainly in Iraq who saw knowledge as comprising case law and the body of legal rulings reached primarily by individual reasoning exertion [ijtihaḍ al-ra‘y], sometimes without reference to sacred texts. During most of the 2nd century, ahl al-ra‘y were ascendant and dominated legal reasoning. In the last quarter of the 2nd century, the ahl al-ḥadīth experienced a strong upsurge and exerted a powerful pressure on the rationalists leading to their partial decline. By the close of the 2nd century, Traditionalists had become a counter prevailing force, and “by the middle of the 3rd/9th century, Ḥadīth had won the war against ra‘y”. In the 2nd century only a few jurists were seen as Traditionalists, while by the end of the 3rd century “most jurists... combined the two in some way”. During the course of the 3rd century, “the Traditionalist movement took a sharp turn towards a total opposition to rationalism, including its use of the method of qiyaṣ... The final defeat of the rationalists was exemplified both in the withdrawal of the Mihḍa and in the emergence of its victims as heroes, with Ibn Ḥanbal standing at the forefront. With this defeat, there was implied an acknowledgement that human reason could not stand on its own as a central method of interpretation and was, in the final analysis, subservient to revelation”. The triumph of the Traditionalists was partly due to the weakening of pronounced rationalism, and partly to withdrawal of political support from an increasingly unpopular position.

16 On this controversy, see the balanced appraisal by Hallaq, Origins and Evolution of Islamic Law, pp. 52–54, 74–76, 113–119, 122-128, 140–146. We follow Hallaq closely here in our summary overview.

17 ibid, p. 123.

18 ibid, pp. 124–5.
The normative synthesis between these contrasting approaches fructified the classical elaboration of Muslim legal theory, spearheaded by the creative work of Muhâammad b. Idrîs al-Shâfî‘î (d. 204/819) who trained in both Makkah and Madinah, worked in Iraq and Yaman, and died in Egypt. Shâfî‘î validated rational procedures for deducing legal rulings, but confined personal reasoning exertions to an inference based only upon the sacred texts of Qur‘an and Prophetic traditions, a method he accepted as the technique of qiyaṣ (inferential reasoning). “After Shâfî‘î the Traditionalist movement gained significant strength, attracting many jurists who can easily be described as staunch opponents of rationalism.”¹⁹ Ibn Hânbal and Dawûd al-Zâhirî (d. 270/883) “…went much further in their emphasis on the centrality of scripture and on the repugnant nature of human reasoning. For them, the latter detracted from knowledge of revelation which, in Dawûd’s eyes, could be gleaned from the revealed language itself without impregnating these texts with human meaning.”²⁰ Yet extreme forms of Traditionalism and rationalism did not appeal to the majority of Muslims. “The Traditionalism of Ibn Hânbal was seen as too austere and rigid, and the rationalism of the Mu’tazila and their supporters among the ahl al-ra’y as too libertarian. … It was the midpoint between the two movements that constituted the normative position of the majority; and it was from this centrist position that Sunnism, the religious and legal ideology of the majority of Muslims, was to emerge.”²¹

This “Great Synthesis”, as Hallaq calls it, encouraged the re-grounding of the positive legal doctrine of rationalist jurists upon Prophetic Hâdîth through a methodology of legal theory [usûl al-fiqh] that embraced both the corpus of Hâdîth and individual reasoning [ra’y]. At the same time, Traditionalists had to meet rationalism halfway and to some degree accommodate a creative rational approach; “…for the Hânbalite school to survive, it had to move from conservative Traditionalism to a mainstream position, one that accepted a synthesis between Traditionalism and rationalism”.²² The consequence was that disciplines previously formally distinct or separate, now commonly became integrated and combined:

---

¹⁹ ibid, p. 124.
²⁰ ibid.
²¹ ibid, p. 125.
²² ibid, p. 127. The Zâhirite school, which remained steadfastly literalist and rejected the synthesis, expired.
scholars emerged who were simultaneously Traditionalist-jurists and rationalist theologians competent “to conceptualize legal theory as a synthesis between rationality and the textual tradition, that is, between reason and revelation”.

II. Ignoramuses

Halkin collected information about those circles labelled by their opponents as “Hāshwiyyah”, yet vagueness has clung to this designation and who they represent. Hāshwiyyah (the meaning of ḥāshw is discussed below) was a pejorative term for the strict Sunni Traditionalists among the asḥab al-hadīth who interpreted Qur’anic verses and narrated traditions by literal anthropomorphism and upheld a rigid theological determinism (Mujbirah and Mujabbirah [fatalists]). In the 3rd/9th century, the Sunni litterateur Ibn Qutaybah (d. 276/889) stated that professional Sunni Hādīth experts or asḥab al-hadīth were nicknamed ghuthah [scum], Hāshwiyyah, Nabītah, or Mujabbirah (clearly pejorative labels by opponents). Also in the 9th century, the Mu’tazilī rationalist theologian al-Khayyāt refers to the opposition of his own school to “those Nabītah who swear allegiance to the tyrannical Syrian gang”. (By Syrians is meant the Banū Umayyah or Umayyad dynasty centred in Damascus whose fourteen kings held central power from 41–132/661–750). The contemptuous label “rogues” [nabītah and nawābit] was a slur by opponents who resented their presumption of religious authority, intolerance toward differences in doctrinal thought and self-appointed role as arbiters of “orthodoxy”. The famed Mu’tazilī author al-Jāhiz (d. 255/868–9) in his barbed Epistle on the Stupid Rogues [Risālah fi Nabītah] applied “nabītat al-hāshwiyyah” to a certain group allied with (probably Ḥanbali) Sunni Traditionalists whom he regarded as a small upstart group.

23. ibid, p. 127–128.

25. For orientation on this issue of anthropomorphism, see Josef Van Ess, Flowering, pp. 45–77; Van Ess, “Le Mi’rağa et la vision de Dieu…” & his Theologie und Gesellschaft IV, pp. 387–391.

26. In his Ta’wil Mukhtalif al-Hadīth (Cairo ed., p. 96); cited by Halkin in “Hāshwiyya”, p. 4 n. 5.

of recent formation seeking to impose an authoritarian censorship over intellectual discourse and rational disciplines.\textsuperscript{28}

Ja\textsuperscript{h}iz\textsuperscript{2} makes it clear that these presumptuous interfering fools had a political agenda—namely, cooperation and support of Sunni rulers, in particular upholding the legitimacy of the previous Umayyad kings—as well as opposing doctrinal “inventions” taught by rationalist thinkers and theologians of all stripes, the despised Shi\textsuperscript{a}h groups, or early ascetic-mystics (later termed Sufis). He points to their cherishing the first Umayyad Caliph Mu\textsuperscript{2}awiyah (rg. 661–680 C.E.): “Do not calumniate him for he is one of the Companions; to calumniate Mu\textsuperscript{2}awiyah is an innovation. Whoever hates him contradicts the Sunnah!” Ja\textsuperscript{h}iz\textsuperscript{2} retorts sarcastically: “They believe that the Sunnah obligates us not to declare ourselves free from one who dis-acknowledges the Sunnah;” and he goes on to condemn their state-friendly attitude—while murder is wrong:\textsuperscript{29}

Yet when the murderer is an unjust sultan or a disobedient prince they do not permit anyone to criticize him, repudiate him, or remove him...even when he threatens the righteous, kills the theologians, starves the beggar, wrongs the weak, leaves the borders and frontiers undefended, drinks wine and sins publicly.

Of course, Ja\textsuperscript{h}iz\textsuperscript{2} belonged to the Mu\textsuperscript{t}azilite trend of thought who agreed on upholding five fundamental principles of divine Justice and Oneness, the fifth being “commanding right and forbidding wrong”.

Quietism: It is fair to state that the characteristic early Sunni Traditionalists’ rejection of rebellion against unjust rulers or of upholding justice by the sword, largely coincides with the pre-destinationist and anthropomorphic dogmas of the H\textsuperscript{a}shwi\textsuperscript{y}ah who maintained that God has Himself decreed the abuse or oppression Muslims experienced from authoritarian tyrants.\textsuperscript{30} On the other hand there also existed a deeply rooted conviction that “disobedience to tyrants is obedience to God” (to cite both Thomas Jefferson and Ayatulla\textsuperscript{h} Khumayni). There was the long-\textsuperscript{28} In Rasa\textsuperscript{il} al-Ja\textsuperscript{h}iz\textsuperscript{2}, ed. Ha\textsuperscript{ru}\textsuperscript{n}, II pp. 7–23. Over a century later, the Zaydi Mu\textsuperscript{t}azilite Ah\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}n\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}ad b. al-H\textsuperscript{\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}usayn Mankd\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}m (d. 425/1034) explicitly identifies them with Hanbalites—al-H\textsuperscript{\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}ashwi\textsuperscript{y}ah al-Nawab\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}t min al-H\textsuperscript{\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}anbal\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}ah)—see his Ta\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}li\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}q Shar\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}h\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}al-U\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}b\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}al-Kh\textsuperscript{\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}amsah, p. 527.

\textsuperscript{29} Risa\textsuperscript{lah fi\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}l-Nab\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}thah; & cited by Halkin, pp. 4–5 (apud Van Vlo\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}ten p. 118).

\textsuperscript{30} Cook, Commanding Right, pp. 49–50, 237, 224, 334–337; & al-Ash\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}ari\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}, Maqa\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}la\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}t al-Isla\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}mi\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}y\textsuperscript{\textasciitilde}n, p. 451–452.
standing ‘Alid Shi‘ite tradition of insurrection against unjust rule beginning from the mid 1st/7th century. Most Mu‘tazilah taught that rebellion against an unjust ruler is known by both reason and revelation, thus “the betrayal of forbidding wrong by the Traditionalists [Hāshwīya] is a favourite theme of the Mu‘tazilites.”

‘Amr b. ‘Ubayd (d. 144/761), a forefather of the Mu‘tazilah, complained that “those ignorant Traditionalists [ḥāshwīya] were the ruin of the religion for they held people back from standing up for justice and “commanding right”.

A Mu‘tazilite rival of Jahāzī, Aḥmad b. Qal‘ah b. Ṭāhā b. Makhfī (d. 240/854) likewise attacked the Traditionalist hāshwī-folk [ahlū l-hāshwī min aslābī l-hādiθ] among the public for their ignorance and blind obedience to Umayyad propaganda almost a century after the fall of their dynasty, complaining that “although the Umayyad kings are now extinct, nevertheless their public and partisans are evident among us today clinging to what they inherited from their tyrannical kings”.

A Mu‘tazilite rival of Ja‘fār b. Mālik b. ‘Ammār al-Mu‘āwīya (d. 240/854) likewise attacked the Traditionalist hāshwī-folk (ahlū l-hāshwī min aslābī l-hādiθ) among the public for their ignorance and blind obedience to Umayyad propaganda almost a century after the fall of their dynasty, complaining that “although the Umayyad kings are now extinct, nevertheless their public and partisans are evident among us today clinging to what they inherited from their tyrannical kings”.

Iskafī asserts that in his own era (the first quarter of the 3rd/9th century) the majority of Muslims continued to adhere to some form of the older Umayyad dogma about the first Caliphs: by excluding ‘Ali> from the “Rightly Guided” successors to the Prophet.

The 5th/12th century Zaydi-Mu‘tazilite al-Hākim al-Jishumi (d. 494/1101) upheld the duty of rebellion against unjust rule as obligatory by word and sword, and lampooned the Hāshwīya’s rejection of “forbidding wrong” or resisting unjust rule; rather they held that “obedience [inqiyyad] is due to whoever wins [ghalaba], even if he is an oppressor [zālim].” This attitude reflects the apolitical doctrine upheld by Ibn Hānbal.

In his short satiric Epistle of the Devil to his Baleful Brethren, Jishumi has the Devil explain that he spread quietist notions of rendering obedience to every usurper in order to subvert Islamic authority and the revolt against unjust tyrants, and that his brethren (i.e. Sunni Traditionalists) busied themselves with relating traditions supporting it. The leading Ḥanafī Muʿtazilite scholar of Baghdad, Abu Bakr Jaṣṣaṣ (d. 370/981) in his work on Qur’anic law asserted that the Iraqi jurist Abu Ḥanīfah (d. 150/767, eponym of the Ḥanafī legal school) firmly upheld the obligation of forbidding wrong both by word and by sword, and he directed a fierce polemic against the spineless attitude of ignorant anthropomorphist Traditionalists [qawm min al-ḥashwi wa juhābi asḥābi l-hadīth], abbreviated by Cook in these words:

---

31 Cook, Commanding Right, p. 336. Later when they enjoyed the support of the state, the Baghdadi Mu‘tazilites viewed “commanding right by the sword” to be valid only in the absence of a proper ruler [imām], while Basran Mu‘tazilites held that it is better to have recourse to an imām, and only when one is lacking or absent does recourse to the sword become valid.

They alone... deny the duty. They reject resort to arms in the execution of the duty, calling all such action sedition [fitna]. They hold that injustice and murder may be committed by a ruler with impunity [la-yunkar ‘alayhi], while other offenders may be proceeded against by word or deed—but not with arms. ... It is these attitudes that have led to the present sorry state of Islam— to the domination of the reprobate, of Magians, of enemies of Islam; to the collapse of the frontiers of Islam against the infidel; to the spread of injustice, the ruin of countries, and the rise of all manner of false religions. All this... is a consequence of the abandonment of the duty to command right and forbid wrong, and of standing up to unjust rulers.

Jaṣṣaṣ further argued for the obligation to resort to arms to extirpate certain politico-legal abuses such as collection of non-canonical taxes, it being the duty of Muslims to kill such tax-collectors.

Apart from the Muʿtazilah, other authorities within normative Sunni Islam including the leading Shāfiʿi Ashʿarite scholar, Abu Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī (d. 505/1111) were prepared to countenance the use of force and organizing armed bands to forbid wrong; while the iconoclastic Andalusian thinker Ibn Ḥazm (d. 456/1064, perhaps the last exponent of the Zāhirite law school), strongly supported recourse to arms where necessary— an unjust ruler must be deposed should he fail to reform and submit to appropriate penalties—and levelled a devastating polemic against the political...

---

35 Indeed Abu Ḥanīfah died in an ‘Abbasid prison, either by poison or execution, for his active ideological support of the revolt of the Ḥasanid ‘Alids in 145 H against the Caliph al-Mansūr.
However, even while the aslāb al-hādīth taught that prayer behind an imām whether righteous or corrupt [fasīq, ghayr ‘ādhil] was obligatory, and discouraged revolt against an oppressive ruler—they upheld as valid the duty of a continuous jihad against non-Muslims to spread the Islamic polity. \(^{38}\)

Abuse. As a scornful term of abuse, it is revealing that Muʿtazila thinkers employed this label early on and wrote works ridiculing and exposing the fallacies of this trend. It shows them on the defensive after the failure of the ‘Abbasid Inquisition in the face of the rising tide of Sunni orthodoxy during the 3\(^{rd}\)/9\(^{th}\) century. For parallel reasons, Imāmi Shiʿah thinkers in the same era also composed works attacking the Hāshwiyah, notably the hard-hitting ridicule of The Clarification [Kitāb al-Idāh] by the Imāmi scholar from Nisābūr al-Fadl b. Shāhān (d. 260/874) which is extant and published in an excellent edition; \(^{39}\) as well as the heresiographers ʿAbdallāh al-Qummi (d. ca. 300-310 H) in his Firaq al-Shiʿah\(^{40}\) and Saʿd b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qummi (d. ca. 300 H) in his Maqalat. \(^{41}\) Nawbakhti explained the origin of the Hāshwiyah thus: \(^{42}\)

When ʿAlī was slain the party who followed him, with the exception of a small number in his own group and of those who maintained his right to the Imamate after the Prophet [i.e. proto-Shiʿah], met the group that had supported ʿAlī’s followers and joined forces with Mu‘awiya ibn Abu Sufyān. These

---

\(^{38}\) Aṣhāri, Muqālaṭ al-Islāmiyya, p. 295. This doctrine was also part of the legacy from the Umayyads; Sunni juristic validation of continuous state jihad was partly motivated for reciprocal recognition and authority of their juridical power to enforce shariʿah law.

\(^{39}\) In my view, Idāh likely combines Fadl’s two polemic books: al-Radd ʿala al-Hāshwiyah and his al-Radd ʿala al-Murjiʿah; see the titles listed by al-Najashi Rijāl, pp. 168–169, al-Tūsī Fihrist (3rd pr. Beirut, 1983) §564, p. 154–155; Ibn Shahrashub, Māʾāmin al-Ulma (Najaf, 1961) §627, p. 91. Note that Ibn al-Nadim, Fihrist (ed. Tajaddud, Tehran, 1971), pp. 29, 38, 287 describes Fadl as also authoring works on Qur’ānic sciences admired by the Hāshwiyah. The polemic work al-Mustarshid fi l-Imāmāh by the Imāmi scholar Mūḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Rustam al-Ṭabarīṣ al-Kābir (d. early 4\(^{th}/10\)\(^{th}\) century) adapted much from Fadl’s Idāh; the same author also wrote al-Idāh fi l-Imāmāh, see Najashi Rijāl, §1025 & Ibn Shahrashub, Māʾāmin §715; this might account for Fadl’s work to have acquired its present title.

\(^{40}\) Cited by Halkin, “Hāshwiyah”, p. 5–10 passim.

\(^{41}\) Saʿd al-Qummi, Muqālaṭ wa l-Firaq §14 “ahl al-Hāshw wa ittībaʿ al-muluk [ignoramuses and the followers of kings]”, §18 proto-Sunni: aslāb al-hādīth = al-Hāshwiyah as the vast majority; on their political neutrality see §41 & §47. Saʿd’s Maqalat incorporated Nawbakhti’s Firaq along with supplementary materials.

\(^{42}\) al-Qummi, Muqālaṭ §14, repeating what Nawbakhti wrote in his Firaq; cited by Halkin, p. 6.
comprise the vast majority: the ahlu l-Hashw, followers of the Kings and supporters of the victorious, I mean those who joined Mu’awiyah. They were called Murji‘ah because they accepted the opposing parties, deeming all the ahl al-qiblah (who pray toward the Ka‘bah) to be believers by merely pronouncing a confession of faith, and hoped for forgiveness for all.

This is a non-Sunni viewpoint yet quite objective, and dovetails with the Sunni Mu’tazilite views canvassed above. Thus Nawbakhti equated the Hāshwiyyah with the Murji’ah [Postponists] and majority of the Sunni public, used here to comprise virtually the entire community (save for the Shi’ah and Kha’rijites). Fadl b. Shadhan’s Clarification is especially illuminating since he pursues his detailed polemic against emerging Sunni “orthodoxy” by citing at length only Ḥadīths they themselves narrated and gave credence to, in order to demonstrate how nonsensical and ignorant their doctrines were.

Yet others view the Hāshwiyyah as a non-Hanbali faction, or at least wider and more inclusive of other Traditionalist Ḥadīth folk than only Hanbalis. Michael Cook accurately yet loosely describes this label as “a rude term for anthropomorphist Traditionalists”. Wael Hallaq cites remarks by the metaphysically inclined mystic Abu Ḥaṣṣā’s ‘Adīn al-Ghazālī that they “believe that they are bound to a blind and routine submission to the criterion of human authority and to the literal meaning of the revealed books”, and by the rationally inclined Hanbali savant ‘Ali b. ‘Aqiṣ that “they believed that there is something in human reason that contradicts the Shari‘a”. Both these scholars were normative 5th/11th century Sunni thinkers of wide authority, and their statements clearly indicate that in their era, the Hāshwiyyah were 43 Iḥāt, pp. 7–44 citing aqwānī ashbīḥ l-ḥadīth; & pp. 93–503 for extended polemics with the ‘Murji‘ah’. It should be observed that later Ima’mī Shi’ah scholars sometimes applied the term Hāshwiyyah to Shi’ah traditionalists who interpreted certain Ḥadīth about pre-creation existence of Spirits of the Prophet & imāms in a semi-anthropomorphic or gnostic sense; thus al-Shaykh al-Mufīd (d. 413/1020) condemned the Hāshwiyyah al-shi‘ah.

---

44 Hallaq, “Was the Gate of Ijtihad Closed?”, p. 9–10.

45 Cook, Commanding Right, p. 49.

deemed to be outside the pale of “orthodoxy” by some mainstream Sunni thinkers, primarily because of their hostility to reason.

The evidence of our sources suggests that one should make a distinction between the Hashwiyyah and Hadith Traditionalists [Ash'ab al-Hadith], yet because they both shared so many doctrines in common they were often mentioned in the same breath, frequently along with “the public [al-'Ammah]” and the “Postponeists [Murji’ah]”. It is significant that the intellectual defender of Traditionalist dogma Abu'l-Hasan al-Ash'ari (d. 324/935–6) did not employ the term Hashwiyyah in his major review of Muslim doctrines Maqalat al-Islamiyyin, although his section on the doctrines of the main orthodox group “Ash'ab al-Hadith wa ahl al-sunnah” covers all major points. Both Traditionalists and the Ash'arite theologians concur that unaided human reason cannot discern right from wrong, and is guided by revelation to this knowledge. Sunni Traditionalists certainly exhibited shades of opinion on a number of critical issues, notably over the divisive question of the increate Qur’an with a significant wing maintaining an “articulatory [lafziyyah]” position: Qur’an is God’s uncreated and pre-existent Speech, yet our voiced articulation and writing of it are temporally originated. However the radical Traditionalists fiercely insisted on the increate nature of sounding and writing its words, charging the lafzi with unfaith [takfir]. The great Central Asian Traditionalist al-Bukhari (d. 256/870) whose compilation of sound traditions al-Jami’ al-Sahih is deemed the most authoritative collection among Sunni Muslims, held to this lafzi view — for which he was hounded out of first Samarqand, and then his home town Bukhara, by intolerant Traditionalist rivals who charged him with kufr over this issue; he died in a small village shunned in humble obscurity. A somewhat similar cloud hung over the celebrated Sunni jurist-historian Abu Ja’far Ibn Jarir al-Tabari (d. 310/923, founder of the separate Jarir school which became defunct), who was involved in an ugly dispute with the disciples of Ibn Hanbal over interpretation of a Qur’anic verse (Isra’17:79 – a 47 The editor of I'dah, al-Husayni cites (p. 42 n.1): the Tafsir of Abu'l-Futuh al-Razi (first-half 6th/12th century) who frequently gives the views of “Hashwiyyah ve ash'ab li-Hadith”; & 'Alam al-Huda (d. 1115/1704), Tanzih al-Anbiya>viz. the view shared both by Hadith folk and Hashwiyyah that prophets may commit major sins before their prophetic mission or even during their mission, thus denying their impeccable immunity.

48 pp. 290-297; see also pp. 5, 172, 211, 217, 451-452, 586 & 602. Nor did al-Baghdadi in his Farq bayn al-Firaq; see Halkin op. cit. p. 26. Shahrastani, al-Milal I, p. 86, observes that al-Ash'ari was sometimes labelled among the Hashwiyyah, or among the moderate Jabriyyah [determinists] (probably by Mu'tazilite opponents).
“praiseworthy position” promised to the Prophet). Invoking a weak singular hadith, these Hanbali disciples insisted this verse meant that on resurrection day, God would seat Muhammad beside Him on His Throne. Tabari is said to have been buried secretly at night in order to forestall any possible disturbances at his funeral by the unruly rabble.49

Stuffing. The Arabic verb h ash yah Hughes signifies “to stuff”—as a cushion or pillow is stuffed with cotton, or as a lamb, fowl or vegetable is stuffed with rice; thus h ash yah denotes a stuffed pillow or mattress (also a menstrual cotton pad worn internally), while mah shuw is a well-known delicious dish of stuffed zucchini, eggplant or bell pepper (c.f. mah shah [contents of the colon]).50 The verbal noun h ashw literally denotes “stuffing” or “padding”. By extension, h ashwah” connotes empty verbiage, “a redundant excess of speech of no profit or utility”;51 and more frequently, the ignorant rabble and basest sort of people (e.g. slaves and servants—thus h ashwah) given to repeating empty nonsense. In this sense, the feminine-nisbah form h ashwiyah is applied contemptuously to a class or body of people imagined as collected into a medley of base persons occupied with purveying ignorant speech or narratives of little meaning and value.52 The Zaydite, Abu Yahya observed: “the Hashwiyah are those who relate ignorant-nonsensical narrations [al-ahdith al-mahshuw] which the reprehensible innovators stuffed[hashedha] the traditions of God’s Messenger full of.”53 Thus, the term h ashwiyah may also be rendered “Stuffers” who padded Prophetic Hadith with ignorant stupidities. This lends credence to its employment by rationally inclined circles who appreciated the 49 See the balanced treatment by Rosenthal in his General Introduction to History of al-Tabari, pp. 69–79. Rosenthal observes (pp. 71–72): “Hanbalite championship of the tradition produced vehement outpourings of hatred against those who opposed it... They were called by every conceivable epithet; they were branded as innovators, liars, ignoramuses, heretics [zindoq] and unbelievers. Above all, they were seen as Jahmis; that is, speculative theologians [Mutazilites].” The slander they slung at Tabari that he held Shi’ite views may have been due to his defence of the soundness of the hadith of Ghadiir Khumm (where the Prophet singled out ‘Ali as his potential successor), in his unfinished work Fadai al-‘Ali b. Abi Taib; see Rosenthal, General Introduction, pp. 59–62, 91–3, 123–4.

50 See major classical lexicons, beginning with al-Khalil b. Ahmad (d. 175/792), al-‘Ayn; also E. W. Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon (London, 1863–1877) s.v. hishwa.

51 Jurja, Ta’ri’fat, p. 171 §624.

52 Employed in this sense by Jahzi in his literary classic al-Bayan wa l-Tabyin, p. 137 “I mention the commoners and I don’t mean the peasants or the ignorant-rabble [hashwa]”; & p. 144 “... for the barbaric speech (of a Bedouin) is understood even by the stranger and the ignorant-rabble.”

53 Cited by Halkin op. cit. p. 25 n.25, after Houtsma. The phrase “al-ahdith al-mahshuw” conveys, of course, the simultaneous sense “stuffed with nonsense” as well as the stuffing or padding of the body of Prophetic traditions, thereby swelling them with invented reports.
double-entendre conveyed by ḥaskwiyya—not only were they stuffed with nonsense, but they devoted themselves with stuffing the corpus of Prophetic Ḥadīth with their ignorant nonsense. Halkin is correct in characterizing the origin of this term as “more in the nature of popular etymology”. Haskwiyya may thus be rendered “ignoramuses spouting empty nonsense”, while simultaneously bearing the secondary connotation of “unruly rabble” and “ignorant throng”. The history of Ḥanbalite Traditionalist fanaticism and violence in the central Islamic empire, particularly in Baghdad during the 4th–6th/10th–12th centuries under Buaryawan and then Saljuq rulers, confirms this association of unruly rabble and ignorant verbiage.

An early attested Islamic use of ḥashw in this extended meaning occurs in a statement by the fourth “rightly guided” Caliph ‘Ali b. Abī Tālib (assassinated 40/661, first-cousin and son-in-law of the Prophet), preserved in the famous collection of his utterances and letters Path of Eloquence [Nahj al-Balagha], in which he castigates the so-called “learned” deemed by people as knowledgeable and who pose as competent to pass legal judgements, yet in reality are ignorant and perpetrate injustice:

... He poses as a magistrate [qaḍī]—assuming responsibility for unravelling intricate problems baffling others. When an obscurely difficult issue is put to him, he contrives for it an ignorant-nonsensical invalidity out of his errant-opinion [haskw rathth min ra’yihi], confidently asserting it as a sound solution. Yet due to dubious uncertainties he falls prey to a spider’s web of confusion. Incapable of appreciating truth and blind to enlightenment, he relies on ignorant suppositions in a senseless haphazard manner [jahli khabba jahalati]...

‘Ali’s statement condemning those poseur ‘ulama’ who offered invalid legal rulings out of shallow ignorance was transmitted separately in another version from that recorded by al-Shari'a al-Radi in his Nahj. This variant form is preserved by the Mu'tazilite Abu Ja'far al-Iskafi (d. 240/854), by the leading Sufi exponent Abu Tahir al-Makki (d. 386/996), and by the authoritative Imam scholarly Abu Ja'far al-Tusi (d. 460/1067). 'Ali castigated certain of his contemporary judges in the decades following the death of Muhammad, whose expertise in the Qur'an and Prophetic teachings was flimsy at best and who relied heavily upon their own faulty reasoning or unfounded opinion when deducing case law. His rejection of reliance upon reasoned-opinion [ra'y] was to become a standard feature of Imami-Shi'i legal thought, which instead made reason ['aql] as one basis for legal rulings—in place of inferential reasoning [qiya스] as in most Sunni schools of law.

---

54 ibid, p. 24.

III. Traditionalist Doctrines

The foundations of Sunni Traditionalism are strict adherence to the texts of the Qur'an [al-Kitaи], the Sunnah (authoritative practice) of the Prophet, and Consensus [ijma] (mainly of the first generations of scholar-authorities). The unrivalled wellsprings of truth are the sacred texts of al-Kitaи wa l-Sunnah, for they also serve as the criterion for examining what humans obtain through their reason. Their understanding of Sunnah incorporated not only the canonical corpus of Prophetic Hadith, but also the consensus opinions of the early generations of righteous forebears or salaf. This type of scriptural and hadith-based thinking should not be underestimated, since its importance for the elaboration of doctrine in the first three Islamic centuries was considerable. Traditionalists generally avoided speculative reasoning, nor did they rationally compare Qur'anic verses or Hadith narratives in order to draw doctrinal conclusions. They invoked the precedent of early Muslim authorities who had neither interpreted anthropomorphic expressions in the Qur'an nor dealt with figurative interpretations of "ambiguous verses" (the mutashabihat), and they strongly condemned fanciful or imaginative spiritual interpretations [ta'wiи] favoured by Sufis and esotericists. Traditionalists developed a thick skin from all the abuse heaped upon them by their rationally oriented opponents, and in 56 It represents partially the same utterance as preserved in Nahj, giving added support for the antiquity and meaning of this use of hашw. This variant version reads: "... hayya'a hашw min ra'yihi [he contrives an ignorant (solution) out of his errant-opinion]". Cited by: al-Iskafi M'iยar pp. 289-290 (introduced as censure of al-hашwiyyah wa l-juhhaи wa l-as}aеб al-riwa}ah); al-Makki Qubal-Qulub, p. 290 (corruption in wording?); al-Tusi Amali, majlis 9 §8, pp. 234–235 (transmitted via Abu Ish}aq al-Sabi'i). M. Ba}qir al-Mah}mud (editor of M'iยar) signals this alternative version is also cited by Ibn 'Asa}kir, Ta'riих Dimashq (tarjamah of 'Ali, ed. al-Mah}mud, III), p. 223.

---

return spurned them as vile heretics [zinda\textit{q} pl. zana\textit{diqah}]. The prominent 3\textsuperscript{rd}/9\textsuperscript{th} century Traditionalist Abu H\textit{a}ti m al-Ra\textit{zi} (d. 277 H) observed: “the sign of reprehensible innovators is their disdain for the People of H\textit{ad}ith; the sign of the heretics[zana\textit{diqah}] is calling the People of H\textit{ad}ith h\textit{ash}wiyah, aiming by that at a nullification of the H\textit{ad}ith...”\textsuperscript{57}

Some even objected to Arabic grammar as tainted by overly rational analytical methods and concerns, as with the Baghdadi Ma\textit{lik}ite jurist Ibn Khuwa\textit{z} Minda\textit{d} (d. 390/999) who demanded the burning of books on rationalist theology [\textit{kalam}], poetry and grammar as unreliable disciplines inferior to Prophetic H\textit{ad}ith.\textsuperscript{58} (Recall that rationalist theologians including the Mu\textit{tazil}ah and later Ash\textit{\'ariyyah} and Ma\textit{tur}idi\textit{yyah} frequently invoked grammatical evidence drawn from the linguists [ahl al-lughah]—who themselves relied on data drawn from poetic citations of pre-Islamic poetry—when interpreting Qur\textit{\'anic} language metaphorically.) Traditionalists further upheld the prohibition against discussing the divine Essence [dha\textit{ti} l\textit{la}h] by means of rational proofs, reflected in their maxim expressed in \textit{h\textit{ad}ith} form as an utterance of the Prophet: “la\textit{t}afakkaru\textit{f}i dha\textit{ti} l\textit{la}h...[do not think reason concerning God’s essence].” When the Qur\textit{\‘an}, Sunna and \textit{i}jma\textit{\textae} are conjoined, they lead to certain and true perceptions which no interpretation can oppose. For example, on whether humans will see God in the Hereafter by a physical eye-witnessing, the reputable central Asian tradent al-Da\textit{rim}i (d. 255/869) asserted: “If the Qur\textit{\‘an}, the Messenger’s utterance and the consensus of the community conjoin, there is no other interpretation,” while the 4\textsuperscript{th} century Ibn M\textit{andah} (d. 1004 C.E.) stated: “God’s Messenger ordered not to deal with nor discuss God through rational arguments and to avoid what would bring about doubts.”

\textbf{Hadith Religion.} Sunni guardians of tradition busied themselves with collecting, purifying, and compiling the vast mass of narrated-reports transmitted over generations from the Companions on the Prophet, forming the basis not only of the Prophet’s Sunnah and religious Law [\textit{shari\textae}ah] but also of basic creedal doctrine. For example, Ah\textit{m}ad Ibn H\textit{an}bal compiled his \textit{M\textit{usn}ad} consisting of ca. 30,000 traditions arranged under names of Companions who audited them from the Prophet and transmitted them to their pupils the “Successors”; these traditions were gleaned out \textsuperscript{57} Halkin op. cit. p. 25, citing al-S\textit{a}\textit{bu}n— from \textit{Majmu\textit{\textae}at al-Rasa\textit{\textae}l al-M unim\textit{\textae}h} (Cairo, 1343) I, p. 131.

\textsuperscript{58} Ibn H\textit{\‘a}j\textit{ar} al-Haytami\textit{\textae}, \textit{Fata\textit{w}\textae}, p. 207; cited by Claude Gilliot in his article “Ul\textit{ma\textae}”, \textit{The Encyclopaedia of Islam} (new edition) X, p. 802a. Book burning was also not beyond their purview.
of ca. 750,000 he had recorded directly from tradents he met personally during his years of “search for knowledge” beginning in 179 H (thus for his Musnad he selected about four per cent of materials at his disposal). As a Traditionalist-jurist seeking support for legal opinions, juridical rulings, and creedal doctrine primarily on the basis of Ḥadīth, and who minimized employing reasoning techniques of ra’y or qiyaṣ, Ibn Ḥanbal held that in order to perform his function, a competent jurist should have at his command (i.e. recorded in his written notebooks, or preferably in memory) five hundred thousand Ḥadīth or more.⁵⁹ The very order in which he listed the Companions in his Musnad, beginning with the first four Rightly Guided Caliphs followed by those of the Shura council or the “Ten promised paradise”, then the Family of the Prophet…, was an explicit affirmation of emerging Sunni orthodoxy.⁶⁰

However, Ibn Ḥanbal did not entirely reject “inferential reasoning” in law, like the Traditionalist Dawūd al-Zabīrī (d. 270/883) the founder of the Zāhiri school was to do one generation later; rather he “accepted qiyaṣ only when absolutely necessary, placing far more restrictions on its use than Shāfi’i did”.⁶¹

What were the beliefs and methodology they employed which caused rationalist circles as well as Shi’ite schools from an early period to abuse the most conservative radical Traditionalists among the ash’ab al-ḥadīth by the label “ignoramuses spouting nonsense”? From the first half of the 2nd/8th century the champions of Ḥadīth insisted upon the primacy of narrated traditions, placing them at the centre of their religious and devotional activity. After obligatory ritual requirements of faith such as prayer and fasting, the greatest religious devotional act was the study and teaching of Ḥadīth—defined as Prophetic Sunnah (aḫār Rasūli-llah) transmitted thru connected chains-of-transmitters (isnaḍ) on sound authorities (thiqāt)—since these formed the juridical substance of the Shari’ah for regulating all aspects of individual and communal life. Indeed, the writing of Ḥadīth was preferred over supererogatory prayers or fasts. As the influential Ḥanbali preacher Ibn al-Jawzi (d. 597/1201) later stated of the Ḥashwiyyah: “they deem the valuation of hadith as a whole the same, and hold that renouncing transmission of hadith is on a par with not observing required ritual obligations.” Primacy of hadith was paramount over any linguistic, rational or symbolic attempts to explicate meaning; the narratives must be accepted word for word just as they reached us without inquiring how or why. Characterized by an austere piety and unshakeable conviction of the sacred importance of their task, they applied to themselves the famous utterance of the Prophet:

---

⁵⁹ Ibn Ḥanbal’s pupil, the reputable Traditionalist Abu Zur’ah al-Raẓī (d. 264 H), estimated that his teacher preserved by memory one million Ḥadīths (both isnaḍ and matn). He was present on the day of Ibn Ḥanbal’s death when his note books [usūl] were catalogued; their total volume was twelve & one-half camel loads, or twenty-five bales; Ibn al-Jawzī †Maḥāqib al-Imām, pp. 59–60. Ibn Ḥanbal appears to have had a photographic memory.

⁶¹ Hallaq, Origins and Evolution, p. 124. Ibn Ḥanbal even preferred to accept unsound or “weak [dā’iṭ]” Ḥadīth as a basis for legal rulings, rather than have recourse to inferential-reasoning.

A band from my community shall not cease to establish the truth, while those who forsake and oppose them harm them not, until God's affair is accomplished and they achieve mastery over the people.

Leading guardians of Tradition identified certain among themselves with the saintly “Substitutes [Abdāl]: a mysterious caste of ‘inner humanity’ believed by some to exercise spiritual control over this world. “Sunnah” required holding fast to what the Companions of the Prophet and earlier pious authorities [salaf] practised by following their guidance, and by rejecting all reprehensible innovations and polemical disputation over divisive doctrinal matters.

Majority Assembly. Above all, the early politico-religious disputes among the Companions over succession to the Prophet and bitter polemics over whom among them possessed surpassing merit or had committed errors or sins, was to be avoided for it opens the door to the reprehensible innovations of theologians and rationalists, as well as subversive doctrines espoused by the Shi‘ah. Traditionalism idealized the

---

63 Talbiṣ Ibliṣ, p. 22, where Ḥashwiyyah are treated among the Murji‘ah.
64 Preserved in the collections of al-Bukhari, Muslim, Ibn Majah, & Ibn Ḥanbal’s Musnad; this utterance was often understood to refer to the Abdāl[Substitutes], so named since whenever one expired another takes his place to fulfill his task.
65 Ibn al-Jawzi> Manaqib al-Imam, pp. 147, 180–181, 196; Ibn al-Jawzi>Talbiṣ Ibliṣ, p. 19; Ibn Ḥajar al-Ḥaytami>Fatawa>, p. 426; the authorities making this claim were ‘Ali b. al-Madini, Yazid b. Harun & Ibn Ḥanbal. Yet Ibn Ḥanbal was opposed to proto-Ṣufi devotees who taught Qadari doctrine such as the renunciants on ‘Abbādan island in the Shatt al-‘Arab. The Abdāl were itinerant hermits who sought uninhabited areas to pursue intense devotions or self-mortification; some were sympathetic to the activities of ashab al-hadith. The Abdāl were highly esteemed by early ascetic-mystics who held that there were 40 of them in Syria as well as a certain number in Iraq.
foundational basis of Islamic polity centred upon Muh\u00f1ammad and his close associates and Companions. The overriding reason-for-being motivating Traditionalist identity was their insistence upon conformity to the Jama\u00e0\u00e1h [Majority Assembly], as opposed to division into sects. Adherence to the majority community served as a guarantee for the preservation of the Muslims, while division results in perdition. Uniformity through conformity protects the collectivity or majority group from being led astray into error; therefore disputation [jadal] and divisive intellectual speculations must be rejected—such as the confused and much disputed doctrines purveyed by rationalist theologians [mutakallimu\u00e1n].

In his letter to the Basran tradent Musaddad b. Musarhad al-Asadi\(^\text{67}\) (d. 228/843) spelling out true doctrine, Ibn H\u00e1nbal warns him: “...beware disputation with those holding errant doctrines, and refrain from discussing the shortcomings of the Prophet’s Companions S\u00e1li\u00e1n rather narrate their surpassing merits [fad\u00e1\u00e1'il] and abstain from discussing what broke out between them [al-imsak \u00e2n ma\u00e1\u00e8shajara baynahum].”\(^\text{68}\) This stress on abstention from disputes emanating from the Sunni\u2013Shi\u2013ah schism reflects the well-known politico-theological position of the Murji'\u2019ah characteristic of proto-Sunni\u2013orthodoxy. The doctrine of irja\u2019 [postponement] came to have a double import: the political sense of postponement of judgement until Resurrection Day concerning one committing a major sin (especially in the case of the Companions ‘Uthman, T\u00e1l\u00e1h and al-Zubayr), as well as delaying ‘A\u00e1li\u2019s position among the Rightly Guided Caliphs from first to the fourth in order of merit; and a further theological sense of postponement of works from faith wherein disobedience or sin does not impair faith.\(^\text{69}\)

\(^{67}\) In Ibn al-Jawzi\u2019>, Mana\u00e1qib, p. 166–171; see Halkin, op. cit. p.16 n.28 for further sources. On Musaddad, said to have been one of the first to compile a Musnad, see Ibn H\u00e1jar al-‘Asqalani\u2019s Tahdhib al-Tahdhib X §202; & Ja\u00f1\u00e9m III §4288.

\(^{68}\) This theme of imsak or kaff [abstention] from engaging in bitter disputes over the early schism in the community is stressed by Ibn H\u00e1nbal (e.g. Mana\u00e1qib pp. 166 & 176); it points to the doctrine of irja\u2019 [postponement] and neutrality (c.f. pp. 156, 165). The Sha\u00f1ite Traditionalist Shams al-Din al-Dhahabi\u2019 in his work on major sins al-Kaba\u00f1r, p. 238, when treating the sin of cursing any of the Companions cites h\u00e1dith (from T\u00e1baran\u00e1 in Majma\u00e1 al-Zawa\u00e1d) via the Companion Ibn M\u00e1s\u00e1d wherein the Prophet himself counsels imsak: “If my Companions are mentioned, then abstain (from abusing them) ... fa-imsaku\u2019” Dhahabi\u2019 adds: “thus ‘abstaining’ is the sign of real belief and of consent to God’s bidding, whereas one who does not refrain from censuring the Companions shows himself to be a hypocrite and errant-innovator [muna\u00f1iq and mubtadi].”

\(^{69}\) Ash\u00e1ri\u2019s Maqa\u00e1lt al-Islamiyyi\u00e1n, p. 293; Shahrastani\u2019s al-Milal wa l-Nih\u00e1l I, p. 139–146. Shahrastani\u2019 also points out that the Mu\u00e1tazilah labelled as Murji’ite all who disagreed with them over qadar. The pro-Imami historian al-Mas\u00e1d\u00e1 writing in 332 H appears to count the Hashwihah as one major sect among Muslims that includes a\u00e1sh\u00e1b al-h\u00e1dith, but not the Murji’iah; see Muru\u00e1j al-Dhahab IV
Statements by Ibn Hānbal affirm the identity of Sunnah with narrated Ḥadīth from the Prophet along with Qur’ānic explanations transmitted from Companions or Successors, which are not to be subjected to rational comparisons [qiyaṣ, amthāl] nor to rational methods of ascertaining truth [laṭūdriku bi-l-'uquḍ]. Rather the Sunnah is grasped by adherence to transmitted reports from the Prophet and avoidance of sectarian innovations.⁷⁰ Regarding the doctrines of determinism [qadar] (divine pre-ordainment of human deeds and salvational status), of God being seen by an eyewitness, and of Qur’ān as uncreated divine Speech, he affirmed that one must:⁷¹

... give assent to narrated-traditions regarding (these doctrines) and believe them — Why? is not to be said, nor How?— rather it is a matter of assenting and believing in (these traditions). Whomever did not know the explanation of the specific Ḥadīth, and his intelligence[‘aqluḥu] informs him (of the meaning), then that suffices and is proper for him; so belief in it and consent is incumbent upon him... he is not to reject a single letter of (these traditions) nor other traditions transmitted through reliable authorities. Nor should you dispute or debate with anyone (over their meaning), nor teach others disputation... so that he abandons disputation and gives consent and believes in the transmitted reports. ... For we deem Ḥadīth must be accepted in its literal-external form (‘alaẓahiriḥ) just as it has come down to us from the Prophet Sallallāhu ‘alayhi wa sallam and theological debate over it is a reprehensible innovation; indeed we believe in it literally and do not dispute rationally over its import with anyone.

Thus Ibn Hānbal is reported to have discouraged the asḥāb al-ḥadīth from copying the writings of prominent juridical authorities including the important Kufan

---

⁷⁰ Manaqib, p. 171–172; further see p. 165–166.
⁷¹ ibid, p. 172. Compare Ash’ari, Maqalāt, pp. 211, 217, 290 for “bi-lakayf” & p. 294: ahl al-ḥadīth wa l-sunnah “disapprove of disputation and ostentatious display (in contention) regarding doctrine or arguing over qadar... and in defending their doctrines they contend by assering to sound transmissions [al-riwa’ya t al-saḥiḥ] ... nor do they say ‘how?’ or ‘why?’ for that is a reprehensible innovation.”
Traditionalist-jurist Sufyan al-Thawri (d. 161 H), the great Madinan jurist Malik b. Anas (d. 179), the usuli-jurist Muhammad b. Idris al-Shafi’i (d. 204), or the Iraqi philologist-Traditionalist Abu Ubayd al-Qasim b. Sallam (d. 224), or the Iraqi jurist Abu Thawr Ibrahim b. Khalid (d. 240)—whose writings (kutub al-ra’y) he deemed improperly rationalist. Yet others affirm that he did permit copying the Jami’ of al-Thawri and the Muwattha of Malik. When reminded that the staunch Sunni Traditionalist ‘Abdullah b. al-Mubarak (d. 181/797) had himself copied such ra’y writings, Ibn Hanbal scoffed: “Ibn al-Mubarak didn’t descend from heaven! We are bidden to take knowledge from above [min fawq]” (thru the Prophet — from GOD)\(^72\).

However, the assiduous collector of Ibn Hanbal’s responsa Abu Bakr al-Khalla (d. 311/923) stated that in his early days, Ibn Hanbal had studied the writings of rationalist jurists (kutub al-ra’y) and made his own copies, then later disregarded them in favour of Hadith.\(^73\) This detail plausibly contains truth, for Ibn Hanbal is said to have begun his studies under Qadi Abu Yusuf, the pupil of Abu Hanifa. The reality was that during the 3rd/9th century “migration (or conversion) from the rationalist to the Traditionalist camp was frequent, whereas movement in the opposite direction was rare to nonexistent”.\(^74\) For example, his peer Abu Thawr was known “to have been trained in the ra’y school of the Iraqians, and who became a Traditionalist and a ‘school founder’ in the latter part of his career”.\(^75\) On the other hand, Khalla’s statement could have been intended as a defense of the master from the charge of having been a mere muhaddith [Traditionalist] not a true faqih [jurist], which scholars like Ibn Jarir al-Tabari asserted. Khalla also reported:\(^76\)

> “Hubaysh b. al-Mubashshir and a number of the fuqaha’ said: ‘We would dispute (juridical issues) and oppose all the people in our disputations, but when Ahmad came then we were reduced to silence’

\(^72\) Manaqib, p. 192–3. Also see p. 499–500 for Shafi’i’s alleged indebtedness to Ibn Hanbal’s superior expertise in Hadith. Suyuti, Tanwiir al-Hawa’il (Cairo, 1370/1951; pr. with al-Muwatta) I p. 9 records that Ibn Hanbal transmitted Malik’s Muwattha from Shafi’i as well as other authorities. Consult further Ch. Melchert, “Adversaries of Ahmad Ibn Hanbal”.

\(^73\) Manaqib, pp. 63–4; Khalla further states, “… when he discoursed on fiqh he spoke the discourse of a man who had critiqued these sciences, thus he spoke from a thorough familiarity [… takallama kala ma’rifat in]”. The term fiqh here appears to overlap with the conception of Iraqi legal rationalists with their emphasis on ra’y & qiya. Ibn ‘Aqil also insists on Ibn Hanbal’s profound expertise in subtle juridical matters (ibid, pp. 64–66).

\(^74\) Hallaq, Origins and Evolution, p. 123.

\(^75\) ibid.

\(^76\) Cited in Manaqib, p. 64.
[on account of his superior juristic expertise—or due to his condemnation of contentious disputation?]."

This Hūbaysh b. al-Mubashshir al-Thaqafi\(^77\) (d. 258/872) was the younger brother of a leading Baghdadi Mu'tazilite theologian Ja'far b. al-Mubashshir (d. 234/848), and himself was no stranger to polemical wrangling. The historian al-Mas'udi described Hūbaysh as being "among the learned Traditionalists and chiefs of the Ḥāshwiyyah", referring to the bitter doctrinal disputes between the two brothers and how each swore not to talk to the other until his death.\(^78\)

Ibn Hānbal explicitly forbade the asḥaab al-hadith from attending the circles of rationalist theologians [ahl al-kalām], even if they deployed their arguments to defend the Sunnah.\(^79\) He also strongly discouraged them from attendance at the circle of a prominent Baghdadi Sufi teacher al-Harith al-Muhāsibi (d. 243/857) and prevented him from teaching—although he himself had once requested one of Muhāsibi's pupils to secrete him in the vicinity of their private night session where he listened to this shaykh guiding the inner work of his disciples, becoming so deeply affected that he wept.\(^80\) Muhāsibi lived the final years of his life closeted in his home from fear of mistreatment at the hands of radical Traditionalists in Baghdad; at his death only four persons dared to attend his funeral. The tenor and ethos of a Traditionalist of the caliber of Ibn Hānbal may be appreciated when we recall that in his zeal to practise Muḥammadan Sunnah, he asked permission of his wife to purchase a slave girl, keeping her as his umm walad [love slave] and naming her Rayḥānah\(^81\) in imitation of the Prophet; and he possessed a drinking bowl [qas'ah] used by the Prophet which he would wash in water to drink for cures, as well as a...

---

\(^{77}\) Ibn Hājīr al-'Asqalānī, Tahdhīb al-Tahdhīb II §363, p. 195; Hūbaysh, a reliable Sunni faqīh from Tūs in Khurāsān who worked in Baghdad, was deemed to be of sterling character [fadil] and one of the intelligentsia ['uqla'ā].

\(^{78}\) Muruq IV §2192 (with corruption of his name as āḥ-n-sh): ... min 'ulama' asḥābi l-hadīth wa ru'asa'ī l-ḥāshwiyyah.

\(^{79}\) Manaqib, p. 156; details given in Melchert, "Adversaries of Aḥmad", with a more nuanced context in Hallaq, Origins and Evolution, p. 122–128.

\(^{80}\) Manaqib, p. 186–187. Nevertheless, Ibn Hānbal had a soft spot for pious renunciants and self-mortifiers [zuhhād] and compiled a valuable collection of their utterances in his Kitāb al-Zuhd. Muhāsibi was a Sunni theologian as well as a Sufi theoretician and spiritual master; his work The Essential Nature of Reason influenced later thinkers of the stature of al-Juwayni and al-Ghazali.

\(^{81}\) Rayḥānah bint Sham'ūn (d. 10/631) was a captured Jewess of Banū Nadīr who converted to Islam and was kept by the Prophet as his possession until her death. He gave her a choice, so she chose to remain his slave rather than become his wife and submit to covering her hair & confinement to her chamber; Ibn Hājīr al-'Asqalānī, al-Isbāh IV §446.
lock of the Prophet’s hair to be immersed in water and drunk for the same purpose. On the day during the Inquisition in 218 H when, in the presence of the ‘Abbasid Caliph Mu’tasim, Ibn Hanbal was severely whipped 29 lashes till he lost consciousness, he had this precious lock of hair wrapped in a napkin in the pocket of his shirt.\footnote{\textit{Manaqib}, p. 177 (Rayhannah); pp. 186, 326 (drinking bowl and hair), and the miracle of his drawers not dropping during his whipping.}

\section*{IV. Fear of Reason}

Our intent is not to ridicule notions the Ḥ什wiyah taught, but to uncover and understand an important strand of Muslim experience fuelling rational minimalism, an activist anti-intellectual censorship, and narrow doctrinal conformity. A clearer comprehension of this mentality may help in grasping the dilemma facing Muslims today, and the need to advance critical approaches and fresh creative thinking. Living with ambiguity and open-ended possibilities may be a severe burden for some humans who privilege uniform answers to complex questions and seek reassurance in simplistic conformity. We have alluded to their self-appointed doctrinal role, their self-definition and reductionist epistemology. For ease of presentation, we now provide a brief overview of two major doctrinal issues: God’s increate Speech, and the anthropomorphic vision of God; then we will review the socio-political role exercised by Hanbalism in central Islamic lands which facilitated the prolongation of the Ḥ什wiyahmind-set, and finally glance at the later historical evolution of the Hanbalite school away from its original anti-rationalist stance. This may suffice to highlight the Ḥ什wiyah’s chief feature: fear of reason and the threat posed by the ambiguity imposed by competing ideas, coupled with a failure of creative imaginative thinking.

\textit{God’s Speech.} The radical Ḥ什wiyah doctrine of the Qur’ān taught that its letters, voiced sounds and written words pre-exist creation (increate), for the revealed Qur’ān is identical with the divine attribute of Speech \([\textit{kalam Allah}]\) encompassed within the divine essence.\footnote{Ash‘ari, \textit{Maqalat}, pp. 172, 290, 602; and Shahrastani, \textit{Milal I}, pp. 106–107 for the following citations.} They conceived that “speech may be comprehended only if expressed in (visible) letters and (audible) words \([\textit{layy}u'qalu \textit{kalam} \textit{lay}sa \textit{bi-ḥuru}f \textit{wa la}k\textit{alim}]\”, invoking proof texts from Ḥadith and utterances by reputable early authorities (“what is between the two covers is the Speech of God”) supporting this notion. The Mu'tazilite Mankdīm mentions that “al-Hāshwiyyah al-Nawabit among the Ḥanabilah maintain that this Qurʾān recited in the mosques and written on paper-copies (masāḥif) is not created nor originated-in-time, but pre-exists with God The Exalted.” ⁸⁴ Their doctrine affirmed: “the Qurʾān is God’s increate Speech, and whoever says it is created (originated-in-time) is an unbeliever in God [al-qurʾān kalaʾam Allāh ghayr makhluq, wa man qaʾla huwa makhluq fa-huwa kāfir bi-llāh].” Remember: being declared kaʾfir excludes one from the salvational community of Islam, and in the opinion of some makes it permissible to shed one’s blood.

Thus, the Hāshwiyyah took the Qurʾān to truly be God’s eternal pre-existent Word physically present to our human senses: in our hands and on our tongues. Recall that for the various groupings of Mu'tazilah theologians—who vehemently upheld the absoluteness of divine oneness (tawḥīd)—the Qurʾān is truly kalaʾam Allāh, but cannot be pre-existent (qadiʾm) with the divine essence since they denied that God’s Attributes (His Speech, Knowledge, Power, Will…) form part of His unique indivisible essence, for this violates divine Oneness. For the normative Sunni theological school of Ashʿarites, the Qurʾān is truly qadiʾm, but what is held in our hands and recited on our tongues cannot be God’s Speech; rather kalaʾam Allāh is understood as an attribute or quality integral to His essence. ⁸⁵ However, among the Traditionalists, there were many holding the view that what is in our hands and recited on our tongues is created-in-time (muhādath)—not pre-existent nor divine; this was the Lafzī position adopted by eminent authorities such as al-Bukharī. Obviously the literalist doctrine of the Qurʾān upheld by radical Traditionalists had profound consequences for their understanding of the literary imagery of sacred texts.

Anthropomorphic Vision. The Prophet’s ascension to heaven is mentioned in the Qurʾān (al-Najm 53: 5–12 and 13–18) when Mūhammad saw two visions of God, and in his night journey from Mecca to Jerusalem (al-Israʾ 17: 1). The Qurʾānic phrases

---

⁸⁴ Taʿlīq Sharḥ Usūl, p. 527; & see Shahrastānī > Milal I, p. 107. Some recent Occidental scholars have drawn a parallel between this “orthodox” notion and the Christian doctrine of the sacramental wine and consecrated host becoming the literal blood & flesh of Jesus (Word of God).

⁸⁵ sūrat al-qasīmat bi-dhāli l-Baʿrī; see Shahrastānī > Milal I, p. 96 for al-Ashʿarī’s view that “divine Attributes are pre-eternally subsisting in His Exalted Essence [al-sūrat azalīyat qasīmat] bi-dhālihi Taʿlā], with his doctrine on the Qurʾān close to a lafzī position; Shahrastānī observes “…with this distinction, al-Ashʿarī disagreed with a majority of the Hāshwiyyah who deemed the letters and words pre-existent.” Further, D. Gimaret, La Doctrine d’al-Ashʿarī, pp. 257, 309–322.
fa-istawa> (53:6) and istawa> 'ala> arshihi [He mounted (sat upright on) His Throne] also entered into discussions of the reality of this event, giving rise to various interpretations: a physical eye-witnessing [bi-l-abs}a>r] by Muh}ammad while alive in his body, a dream vision, a heart-vision (bi-qalbihi), or a light-vision.\(^{86}\) In certain h}adi>th narratives about his night journey and ascension where these visions are treated and expanded, there is mention of the Prophet witnessing God seated on His Throne in the form of a youth wearing a crown of light.\(^{87}\) Josef Van Ess, who carefully examined the interpretation (ta'wi>l) of these verses and their complementary h}adi>ths, documents the survival of an “ancient anthropomorphist exegesis” on the margin of official theology: Muh}ammad saw God seated on His Throne;\(^{88}\) and remarking that, “Those who were put off by anthropomorphism would soon come to believe that the Prophet had seen Gabriel, and in this world.”\(^{89}\) Muslim discussions over the proper interpretation of the Prophet’s eye-witnessing [ru’yah] revolved around two points: • affirming the reality of the Prophet’s physical eye-witnessing during his mission on earth, while debating the possibility of believers to experience it in this physical world (ru’yat Alla>h fi> l-dunya>); and • the accepted dogma that all believers shall enjoy the physical vision of God on Resurrection Day, “…as you see the moon on the night of the full moon” when they inhabit their physical bodies in a glorified state (Q 75:22-23).\(^{90}\)

The great historian of religions, al-Shahrasta>ni> (d. 548/1153), provides a portrait of a group of radical Traditionalist anthropomorphists who were condemned...

---

86 See Van Ess, “Le Mi’ra>g| et la vision de Dieu…”, p. 30f.
87 Including the utterance ascribed to the Prophet: “I saw my Lord in the fairest form [ra’aytu Rabbi> fi> ah}sana s}urat]”. J. V an Ess, Theologie und Gesellschaft IV, pp. 380f., 389f.; and especially Van Ess, The Youthful God. Anthropomorphism in Early Islam. While for the early H{ashwi>yah, the “fairest form” was conceived as a radiant young male (perhaps after the fashion of Rabbinic mysticism, c.f. the Shi’ur Qoma [Measurement of His Body]), for the leading Andalusian saint Muh}yi> l-Di>n Ibn ‘Arabi> (d. 638/1240) the “fairest form” of divine self-disclosure was a beautiful young woman.
88 “Le Mi’ra>g| et la vision de Dieu…”, pp. 35–38, 42–45. The influential ascetic-mystic ‘Abd al-Wa>h}id b. Zayd (d. 150/767) who founded the earliest S}u>fi> conventicle on ‘Abbadan island (see n.68 above), invoked Q al-Najm 5–18 to affirm that one can see God not only in Paradise after bodily Resurrection, but also here on earth; Van Ess, Theologie und Gesellschaft II, p. 99.
89 Van Ess, Flowering of Muslim Theology, p. 55. Ibn Jari>r al-T{abari> was skeptical of anthropomorphism, which contributed to his persecution by his contemporary H{anbalites; Theologie und Gesellschaft II, p. 642, III p. 450, IV p. 215.
90 Gimaret, Doctrine, pp. 329–344. Further, the well-informed review on ru’yat Alla>h by Haytami>, Fata>wa>, pp. 199–202 §89. We limit ourselves to mentioning only a few sources on this controversy.
by Mu’tazilites and Ash’arites alike for holding tashbih.

They swelled hadīṣ transmissions with forgeries they ascribed to the Prophet (many derived from Jewish anthropomorphist tradition), such as the Throne creaking under His weight. Fadl b. Shāhān (d. 260/874) in his Clarification had already pinpointed this type of naïve transmission cultivated by the Ḥashwiyah (whom he aligned with the Murji’ah, i.e. proto-Sunnis), subjecting it to devastating ridicule. Shahrastāni remarks:

"... among the Ḥashwiyah are those who are inclined to a type of incarnationism [ḥulul] in asserting that God may appear in the physical form of a human person, just as the angel Gabriel was known to do in the presence of the Prophet, and as He appeared so to Mary. The anthropomorphist Ḥashwiyah like Mudarr, Qahmas and al-Hujaymi assert He is a body [jism] not like other bodies of flesh and blood... He possesses limbs and organs, and it is possible for Him to touch, shake hands with, and embrace the sincerely pious who visit Him and whom He visits in this world."

These three Sunni Traditionalists are extremely obscure, probably because their memory was suppressed out of embarrassment over their ludicrous ideas. Mu’tazilite critics frequently complained about the plethora of such baseless traditions purveyed by exoteric literalists being “completely baseless falsehoods [abāt-i la-ṣla-la-hā].” In fact, these type of naïve traditions proved to be a severe embarrassment for many later Sunni scholar-authorities, not least leading thinkers among Hanbali themselves who were forced to clarify their attitude towards and evaluation of 92 Milal I, pp. 105, 107–108; also cited by Halkin, op. cit. p. 14. There was also a widespread notion that God descends on certain nights to the lower heavens to forgive and grant requests (see Q Baqarah 2:210); & Halkin op. cit. p. 15 n. 20.

---

94 Mirkdim, Ta‘liq Sharh al-Usul, p. 574. The term baṭ‘ (pl. abāb) is a technical term in Hadīth sciences for an improperly or falsely ascribed chain-of-transmission of a tradition narrative.
radical Traditionalists.\textsuperscript{95} The ongoing debate and discussion over this and related issues over the centuries confirms that an intransigent core of Ḥašwiyyah maintained a continuous presence among Sunni Traditionalists down to the modern period—conservative Ḥanbalites as well as certain later Mālikites and Shafi`ites.

An erudite Shafi`ite authority, Ibn Ḥajar al-Haytami (d. 974/1567) treated the question “Is God in heaven?” in his fatwa sketching out normative boundaries of Muslim doctrine regarding issues of physicality and “above-ness [fawqiyyah].”\textsuperscript{96} He unequivocally affirms that the normative mainstream of Muslims agree by consensus on the impossibility of corporeal existence for God, something also affirmed by reason, and they all agree on the impossibility of construing Qur`anic verses and prophetic traditions in their external literal sense. Phrases such as “God is above His Throne” signify the locus of divine essence, not a physical direction; and “He is in every place” signify divine omniscience and omnipotence, not any presence here among His creatures. While the theologians, legal theorists [usuli`]s and wise scholars purify God from all temporal created realities [tanzi`h] and thus agree on the impossibility of the notions “above-ness” and “direction” regarding the transcendent Divinity—nevertheless many Muslims conformed to the attitude of some early salaf by adhering to the literal external meanings of verses and traditions. In the opinion of the great 6th/12th century Malikite authority al-Qadi `Iyad (d. 544/1149), these literalists constituted the mass of jurists and Traditionalists as well as certain of the Ash`arite theologians; while Haytami writing in the 10th/16th century specifies the Ḥašwiyyah as well as certain Malikite jurists.\textsuperscript{97} Now the question arises: are those who uphold reprehensible beliefs of the anthropomorphists [mushabbihah] or the mujassimah (who give God a corporeal body) to be charged with un-faith [takfi`r]? Here, Haytami >

\textsuperscript{95} See, for example, the reasoned defence of Sunni-traditionalism given by the conservative Malikite-faqi`h Yusuf b. `Abd al-Barr (d. 463/1070), Jam` al-Bayan al-Ilm, pp. 109–120, 190–200; the Hanbali-savant `Ali Ibn `Aqil (d. 513/1119) in his unique al-Fu`un, critiques the mentality and approach of many ordinary Hanbalis with their propensity to uphold tashbi`h—see citations about taqdis in Zahr al-Ghus`un, pp. 88–96, and on their over-preoccupation with austerities at the expense of understanding, in Ibn al-Jawzi’s Mana`qib, p. 505; the Hanbali al-Jawzi (d. 597) reviewed the errors of as`hab al-hadith in his Ta`lib al-I`ibis, p. 112–116; as well as the erudite Hanbali `Abd al-Rahman Shiba`b al-Din Rajab (d. 795), Jam` al-Ulama` al-Hikam p. 38.

\textsuperscript{96} Haytami, Fatawa, p. 151–156 §66. Of course, this and the following topic could be far more abundantly documented by reference to the rich literature of kalam and usuli`-al-fiqh; Haytami relies in particular on the Ash`arite theologian and Shafi`ite jurist Imam al-Haramayn al-Juwayni (d. 478/1085).

\textsuperscript{97} Ibid, p. 152. This difference may reflect shifts over four intervening centuries, or more likely the varying perspectives of the Western Malikite school in contrast to Egyptian and Makkan Shafi`ites.
points out differing positions among mainstream Sunni authorities, with one wing holding they should be included within the wider body of the Muslim community and treated like other errant innovators or sectaries (ahl al-ahwa>) since there is a lack of consensus upon the validity of takfi>r in their case (e.g. in the opinion of the Andalusian Maliki> magistrate Ibn Rushd d. 520/1126). Others insisted a definite consensus has been established that upholding God’s “above.ness” or “direction” constitutes un-faith, and therefore takfi>r is valid but only for those who actively espouse this leading others into error, whereas those merely entertaining such wrong beliefs are guilty only of reprehensible-innovation.

In another fatwa> treating the validity of belief in physical eyewitnessing of God in this world [ru'yat Alla>h fi> l-dunya>] Ibn Hajar al-Haytami> states that normative Sunnis do maintain this is possible in accordance with reason and on the basis of revealed data. However, because the relevant rational [‘aqli>] proofs are unreliable, only transmitted [naqli>] evidence is relevant. True: Muhammad may have experienced a physical eyewitnessing during his ascension—but no one here in this world may legitimately make this same claim, which amounts to definite un-faith [kufr] for it implies a corporeal body for God. Haytami> views differing views and shades of meaning with respect to Muslims who apprehend Qur’a>nic verses and Prophetic Hadiths in an explicitly literal sense—since in his view, the pious forebears did not commit this error. A gain, the question of charging them with kufr arises: thus the Sha’>ite Traditionalist-jurist of Damascus, al-Nawawi>(d. 676/1277), validated their takfi>r only if they explicitly affirm God possesses “a body like (corporeal) bodies [jismun> ka-l-ajsam]”—otherwise there can be no valid takfi>r. The most widely accepted position was the one advocated by leading Shaëlites: no charge of absolute kufr is valid. Haytami>’s remarks clearly indicate that charging the 98 Fatawa>, pp. 199–202 §89. C.f. also pp. 286 & 288 for Sunni> discussions whether women enjoy eyewitnessing of God in the Hereafter; and p. 311 for certain Hanbali> jurists who upheld the validity of ritual prayer led by a jinn— or even the legality of marriage with a female jinniyyah.

---

99 Haytami> (ibid, p. 202) cites the Sha’>ite Asharite mystic Abu>l-Qa>sim al-Qushayri> who maintained there exists unanimous consensus [ijma>] upon the position that no eyewitnessing is possible in this world (not even for saints), save only for the Prophet. The fact that Abu> Hasan al-Ash’ari> was reported by some to have accepted the possibility of such an eyewitnessing, leads Haytami> into a technical digression over the validity of such presumed ijma> He concludes: “even if this consensus is not adequately established to the satisfaction of all, nevertheless such a doctrine is of the utmost ‘anomalous-deviancy [shudhu>dh]’ and must be rejected since no one may interpret the Qur’a>n so literally—nor does this claimed lack-of-consensus prevent legitimate takfi>r of those asserting such crass physical eyewitnessing.”
Hashwiyah with unbelief for their extreme literality leading them into doctrinal errors, was favoured by a number of reputable Sunni authorities at different times and places. Bear in mind that the Hashwiyah had long been in the habit of charging with takfir the mainstream Sunni schools of theologians and legal theorists from the mid 3rd/9th century onward. The mind-set of exoteric literalists insisted solely upon primacy of sacred texts, and they viewed legal theory [usul al-fiqh] and rationalist theology as reprehensible innovations, not to speak of those disciplines permeated with philosophical concerns, or metaphysics, or psycho-spirituality.

Hanbalite Activism. The consolidation and continued presence of the Hashwiyah as a definite trend within Sunni Traditionalism was bound up with the rise to prominence of the Hanbali juristic school in Baghdad at the centre of the empire. The swelling wave of Traditionalism fuelling the consolidation of Sunni orthodoxy, matched by the evolution of rationalist schools moderating unfettered reason by embracing the Prophetic Sunnah mediated in hadith, facilitated the emergence of Hanbalism forging close ties to the ‘Abbasid state until the demise of the Caliphate in 656/1258. Under the Bu'yid and Saljuq kings who rose to effective power during the 4th–6th/10th–12th centuries, while propping up the emasculated ‘Abbasid Caliph, Hanbali religious scholars became populist activists and directly involved in the internal politics of Baghdad. With the Caliph increasingly relying on the popular support of this staunch Sunni party in order to counterbalance competing forces in league with ruling power-holders and provincial amirs, Hanbalism achieved its apogee of political influence and social presence. They upheld the weakened Caliphate becoming the chief pillar of its popular support acting as a political party or faction. The Hanbalite party took “forbidding the wrong” against sin, crime and innovative heresy to an extreme—but not against the state which now gave official support to their creed. These later patterns of Hanbalite activism marked by aggressive street populism and power-seeking symbiosis with the state

---

100 See al-Haytami’s spirited defense in Fatawa, app. 152–3, 156–9, 271–3 of Ash’arites and usuli’s from the charge of kufr levelled at them by radical Hanbalites, and his castigating Tāqi al-Dīn Ibn Taymiyyah (d. 728/1328) and his pupil Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyyah (d. 751/1350) for tashbīh, e.g. God has the same measure as the Throne, and for perverse ignorance regarding the metaphoric and symbolic significances of revealed texts. Haytami laments (p. 373): “There is nobody more ignorant than a hadith expert [sahib hadith] who fails to understand his hadith!”

101 See in general Hurvitz, Formation of Hanbalism; Melchert, Formation of the Sunni Schools of Law; as well as Cook, Commanding Right, p. 114–144 on “Hanbalites of Baghdad.”
represent a definite rupture from the heritage of Ibn Hānbal. The public alignment of the Caliphate with Traditionalist doctrine was most prominent under the reigns of the caliphs al-Qādir (rg. 381-422/991-1031) and then al-Qā'im (rg. 422-467/1031-1075).

During the later 4th/10th century, a major confrontation took place between the 'Abbasid Caliphate and the Bu'ayd warlords who had assumed effective power in the central Islamic lands. The Bu'ayd dynasty of rulers (334-447/945-1055) were of Daylamī origin (south of the Caspian Sea) but claimed 'Alid descent; politically and doctrinally they were Twelver Shi'a. Their pro-Shi'a attitude encouraged Zaydi-Shi'a as well as Mu'tazili-intellectual trends. The conflict unfolded around the extremely divisive issue of the Shi'a's habit of abusing the Companions [sabb al-saḥabah] now encouraged as a semi-official policy by the Bu'ayd amirs, which in turn provoked a strong Sunni revival led by Hānbalī circles and was then championed by the 'Abbasid caliph Ahmad b. Ishāq al-Qādir bi-llāh (rg. 381-422/991-1031).

Al-Qādir actively intervened against the public influence of the Imamī-Shi'a and blocked the universal application of Ja'fari-Shi'a law by banning the appointment of a prominent 'Alid to the office of chief qaḍī in the capital Baghdad. In 402/1011 he issued an anti-Isma'ilī manifesto aimed against the rival Fatimid Isma'ilī-Shi'a dynasty with its capital in Cairo, in which he also forbade the teaching of Mu'tazili and Shi'i doctrines. Then in 409/1018, al-Qādir proclaimed a renewed Sunni creedal doctrine inspired by Hānbalī ideas in his official rescript al-risālah al-qādiriyyah which condemned all forms of Shi'ism and Mu'tazilism as well as the newly emergent SunniAsh'arite theology. This proclamation urged the Companions as obligatory, expressly forbade vilifying of the Companions, and promoted the merits [fadā'il] of the first Four Rashidun Caliphs in the now accepted chronological order of precedence upheld by Sunni Islam. Al-Qādir's appeal to the Traditionalist loyalties of the populace verged on attempting to establish the power of the Caliphate on a popular base. The Inquisition initiated by Caliph Ma’mun almost two centuries previously had now been totally reversed. Again in 420/1029, he issued a formal declaration affirming the superiority of the four Rashidun Caliphs. His authoritative enunciation of Sunni abhorrence of doctrinal innovation. The two main Sunni theological schools with rationalist orientation, Ash’arist and Maturidi, had to struggle to gain acceptance.

---

102 Cl. Cahen, “Buwayhids” E.I.2 I, pp. 1350a-1357a; & D. Sourdel, “al-Kādir Bi'llāh” E.I.2 IV, pp. 378a-379a. Zaydi thinkers were frequently Mu'tazilite in theological orientation and politically militant, upholding the principle of forcefully “Commanding Right” by a just ruler from the Prophet's Family. They established local Zaydi states, at first in the area south of the Caspian Sea, and then in Yaman. The last Zaydi Imam of Yaman was overthrown by a socialist revolt in 1962.

During al-Qadir’s era, there appeared a virulent manifestation of Hanbalite presence in the form of unruly public crowds enforcing doctrinal correctness prompted by a fierce animosity towards opposing or rival religious and intellectual movements—whether the Imamite Shi’ah with its Jafari legal school, or the Shafi’ite legal school (and later against the Ash’arite theological school), as well as libertines and heretics. Traditionalists had become more numerous with lower-class adherents, thereby more populist and inclined to violence. W. Madelung portrays early manifestations of this new vocation of Hanbalism as “a militant movement attempting to rule the streets”. By the early 4th/10th century, Hanbalite violence was rampant in the streets of Baghdad, with a penchant for fanatic fury unleashed against hated ‘innovators’, above all the despised Shi’ah whose doctrines always challenged the very identity and self-image of Sunnism. In the first-quarter of the 4th century, Hanbalite crowds led by the popular preacher demagogue Barbahari (d. 329/941), repeatedly disturbed public order to the extent that the Caliph threatened them with severe measures unless they desisted: “... they plundered shops, raided the homes of military leaders and others to search for liquor, singing-girls or musical instruments, challenged men and women seen walking together in public, and fomented ugly assaults on Shafi’ites.”

In this period, Baghdad witnessed a series of bloody clashes between its Sunni and Shi’ite inhabitants, with assaults by vigilante groups resulting 105 Madelung, “The vigilante movement of Sahl b. Salama al-Khurasani”, & sources cited in preceding note. The Damascene Hanbali al-Kharaq (d. 334 H) who produced one of the earliest manuals of Hanbalite fiqh, was beaten to death in the pursuit of “forbidding wrong”.

106 Cook, Commanding Right, p. 117.
in extensive fighting between city quarters (e.g. the Shi'ite district of Karkh) and intervention by caliphal military forces to restore order. Libraries and neighborhoods were burned to the ground in a rabble rousing zeal for true doctrine and guarding the Sunnah of Muhammad.\textsuperscript{107}

These hostilities against innovations and heresy were prolonged well into the 7th/13th century, and had repercussions in other major provinces of the empire. The animosity between Hanbalites spearheaded by their hard-line Hashwiyah faction, and the Sha'ite and later Ash'arite schools “upstaged, but did not end, the older Hanbalite conflict with Mu'tazilism”.\textsuperscript{108} Hanbalite dominance underwent a partial eclipse under the Saljuq Sultans who favoured the Hanafite rite, and whose viziers promoted the Sha'ite school through their system of privately endowed Nizāmiyah madrasahs beginning in 459/1067. This Sha'ite trend was strengthened during the caliphates of al-Muqtadi and al-Mustashir and al-Mustarshid from 467–512/1075–1118, when official state patronage shifted in favour of the Shafi'ite legal-usuli school and Ash'arite theology became accepted as normative Sunni creed. But this suffered a reverse under Caliph al-Muqtafi (rg. 530–555/1136–1160) who resumed state support of the Hanbalite school through his chief minister 'Awn al-Din Ibn Hubayrah (served 544–560/1149–1164), who was also a major Hanbalite scholar. Favoured by state patronage, Hanbalism had gained increasing control over the madrasah educational system by the early 6th/12th century. Caliphal support continued from 555–575/1160–1180 under al-Mustanqid and al-Mustadi while the more independent Caliph al-Nasir (rg. 575–622/1180–1226) maintained the promotion of Hanbalite anthropomorphist doctrine and upheld the prohibition of rationalist theological and philosophical disciplines. With the increased power enjoyed by the Hanbalite community in Baghdad, and the fear and favour such power elicited from non-Hanbalite rulers, the pressure to adapt to their surrounding mainstream Sunni milieu increased and mainstream Hanbalism found it expedient to make concessions bringing itself into line with other Sunni schools. After the Mongol conquests during \textsuperscript{107} Sabari, Mouvements populaires, p. 106–112. Among them was the renowned library [dar al-'ilm] in the Karkh quarter endowed by Sa'ur b. Ardashi-r (vizier of the Bu'yid Amir Baha'-al-Dawlah) reputed to house many precious early writings, burned by the mob in 451/1059. The leading Imamite scholar Abu Ja'far al-Tusi (d. 460/1076) fled Baghdad south to the security of the town of Hillah, establishing there an important Twelver Shi'ite legal-theological centre influential for centuries.

\textsuperscript{108} Cook, Commanding Right, p. 120.
the era of the İlkhan rulers (654–736/1256–1335) the centre-of-gravity for Ḥanbalite scholarly activity now shifted west to Syria.

Reconciliation with Reason. The evolution of Ḥanbalism during the 5\(^{th}/11^{th}\) century and beyond evidences a countervailing trend distancing itself from its hardcore Ḥashwiyyah wing. This new orientation saw the appearance of literary genres and topics not previously entertained among earlier Ḥanbalites due to their entrenched Traditionalist bias. The notable Ḥanbali authority Qaḍī ʿAbd al-Ḥaqq ibn al-Farraʿ (d. 458/1066) and the austere mystically oriented ʿAbd al-Qādir al-Jīlí (d. 561/1166, eponym of the Qādiriyyah Sufi Order) evolved a more-or-less systematic form of theology for the “fundamentals of faith [\(\text{usūl al-din}\)" which drew upon Ḥanafite and Muʿtazilite components. This represented “a Ḥanbalite reception of a Muʿtazilite framework into which specific Ḥanbalite doctrines are inserted when their Muʿtazilite equivalents are deemed unacceptable”.

The notorious case of the distinguished 5\(^{th}/11^{th}\) century Ḥanbalite savant ʿAlī ibn ʿAṣīr (d. 513/1119) is instructive, being charged with un-faith [\(\text{takfīr}\)] by his fellow Ḥanbalites of Baghdad who forced him to publically recant the rationalist Muʿtazili-inspired notions he entertained; out of solidarity with his school he endured this humiliation after remaining in hiding for five years (from 460–465/1068–1072), and even repeated his retraction before the Caliph al-Qaʿīm. Yet it was the same ʿAlī ibn ʿAṣīr who disputed with a Ḥanafite scholar over whether the gate of ḵaṭṭāḥī was closed by insisting that Ṣuḥḥāḥs must exist at all times, which became the standard Ḥanbalite position."

Inferential reasoning [\(\text{qiyaṣ\text{"}}\)] and “individual reasoning exertion [\(\text{ijtihād}\)]” had now became part of the legitimate repertoire of juristic method among Ḥanbalites, and in later centuries, Ḥanbali jurists contributed to its further theoretical elaboration.

The most conspicuous exponent of this new orientation was the leading Ḥanbalite of Baghdad ʿAbd al-Raḥmān ibn al-Jawzī (d. 597/1201), who was open to ideas from a variety of sources (including the Shāfiʿī-Ashʿarite al-Ghazālī), and produced a systematic theology in his Minḥāb al-Wusūl ilā Ilm al-Uṣūl. Ibn al-Jawzī was a

---

109 See the treatment by Cook, Commanding Right, pp. 129–138, pointing to Abu ʿAbd Allāh al-Muṭṭamid fi Usūl al-Dīn & Jiḥālāt al-Ghunnyaṭī-Tāhābī Tārīq al-Haqq; these thinkers and others such as ʿAlī ibn ʿUbayd Allāh ibn al-Zağhūni (d. 527/1132) exhibit “a style of intellectual activity quite unlike that of Ibn Ḥanbal” (p. 138).

110 Hallaq, “Was the Gate of Ijtihad Closed?”, pp. 22–26— the dispute was over the ‘gate of judgeship’.
central figure in the development of Hanbalism away from its conservative Traditionalist base, working hard to bring his fellow Hanbalites into alignment with the broad mainstream of normative Sunnism by rectifying their Traditionalist theology from obscurantist dogmas no longer adequate for the dominant Sunni world-view and epistemology. He indulged in bitter debates and vigorous literary polemics with old-fashioned unreconstructed Traditionalists within his own school, vociferously castigating them for their unmitigated ignorance [jama'ah min al-juhha] and “group-think” mentality [asabiyyah], and for their “absolutely disgusting and repugnant” attitude through obstinate adherence to the literal apparent meaning of Verses of Attributes and Hadith. Ibn al-Jawzi insisted on appropriate use of reason in conjunction with transmitted knowledge to arrive at proper comprehension of Hadith:

Ibn al-Jawzi weighed in on two of the most acute points of friction which Sunni opponents of the Hanbalites frequently derided them for; that Hanbalites are anthropomorphists [mushabbiyah], and their traditional partiality for the Umayyads. Regarding this charge of anthropomorphism, Ibn ‘Aqil had already rejected this outright, and Ibn al-Jawzi wrote Repelling the Specious-Charge of Anthropomorphism [Daf’ Shubah al-Tashbih] treating at length 60 controversial Hadith where he severely criticized major Hanbalites of the past (including Abu Ya’la ibn al-Farra and Ibn al-Zaghuni) for having laid themselves open to this calumny. He cited the Baghdadi Hanbalite Hasan ibn Ha mid (d. 403/1012), who had opined that God indeed has a face although one may not affirm that He has a head. This work is not so much against anthropomorphism as it is a convoluted defense of Hanbalism that it ever 111 See Cook, Commanding Right, pp. 139-143; & Hamid ‘Ali’s trans. Attributes of God, p. 44.

113 Ibn al-Jawzi, Daf’ Shubah al-Tashbih, p. 31, trans. Hamid ‘Ali’s Attributes, p. 42; see Cook, Commanding Right, p. 142 n. 198. Ash’arites had already written polemics against the ignorance of literalist anthropomorphists, such as the work by ‘Ali b. Abu Qa’im Muhammad al-Tamimi, Tanbih al-Ilah wa Kashf Fada’ih Mushabbiyah al-Hashwiyyah; see Halkin, op. cit. p. 25 n. 34.
really upheld such an errant belief, forcing Ibn al-Jawzi> to castigate H<anbalite masters for having clumsily given the wrong impression that tashbih could ever be deemed sound doctrine. In a related work, Kitab Akhba>r al-Sifa>t treating H<adith about divine attributes he amplified his frontal attack;¹¹⁴ such a forceful offence aroused strong opposition among H<anbalite opponents who orchestrated Ibn al-Jawzi>'s arrest and exile to Wasit> (lower Iraq) from 590–595/1194–1199 in his elder years.¹¹⁵

As for the problem of bias toward Umayyad rulers, it centred on the awkward fact that prominent Traditionalist H<anbalites were well-known as staunch defenders of the Caliph Yazid b. Mu'<awiyah (rg. 60–64/680–683), and rejected the claim that Ibn H<anbal had permitted cursing him.¹¹⁶ Yazid was notorious in Muslim history for his responsibility in the slaying at Karbala> of Muhammad's grandson al-Hasayn b. 'Ali> for his sacking of Madinah in the battle of the H<arrath in 63/683 and subsequent burning of the Ka'bah in Makkah; not to mention his fondness for wine, slave-girls, and his pet monkey dressed in satin kept on a chain beside his throne. The portrayal of Umayyad rulers as “rightful successors [khulafa']” to Prophetic authority was a legacy from archaic proto-Sunni ideology cemented into place by the Umayyads by whip and sword,¹¹⁷ along with their public cursing from the pulpits of 'Ali> and members of the Prophet's Household. H<anbalite Traditionalist persistence in validating this legacy clashed with “the philo-'Alid sentiments widespread in mainstream Sunnism”.¹¹⁸ Ibn al-Jawzi> rejected and repudiated Yazid for his behavior.

V. Later H<anbalism

¹¹⁶ Ibn al-Jawzi> aligned the suffering endured by Ibn H<anbal under the Inquisition with whippings and imprisonments of leading 'ulama>ruthlessly meted out by Umayyad Caliphs and governors when enforcing their official ideology, viewing this theology-of-suffering as their mark of grace and naming over 15 famous individuals along with their punishments; see Manaqib, p. 341–343. However, the virtue of speaking out in the presence of an unjust ruler or tyrant, thereby risking death (an action supported by a well-known Prophetic tradition), was strongly discouraged by Ibn H<anbal himself; Cook, Commanding Right, p. 101–102.
¹¹⁷ Cook, Commanding Right, p. 142; Halkin, op. cit. p. 6–7. Veneration of the Prophet's Household was commonplace among Sunnis already, by the early 3rd/9th century, while love for Muhammad's descendants (approved shi>'ism [al-tashayyu' al-hasan]) was particularly cultivated among Shaf'ites.
Till the end of the ‘Abbasid Caliphate, Baghdad remained the centre of Ḥanbalite activity until the Mongols sacked the city in 656/1258. Beginning under the Ayyubids (570–658/1174–1260), the Ḥanbalites established themselves in Damascus, where their legal and theological thought imbued an entirely different atmosphere; as in that era, it was a predominantly Shafi’ite city.\footnote{Laoust, “Le hanbalisme sous le califat de Bagdad”, p. 121–125; Cook, Commanding Right, p. 145–164.} During the 1st century of rule by the Mamluks (658–922/1260–1516), their fortunes improved by virtue of the neutral policy adopted towards the four surviving Sunni law schools by the Mamluk amirs, with Ḥanbalites enjoying salaried appointments in educational institutions from the mid 7th/13th century onward. However, the Ḥanbalites in greater Syria were not closely associated with the state, yet enjoyed a certain solidarity with political authorities, and were more noted for their poverty and lack of office rather than zealous rabble-rousing street-power. The famous Ḥanbalite scholar and avid polemicist Taqī al-Dīn Ibn Taymiyyah (d. 728/1328) exhibited an abrasive personality averse to compromise, yet was popular among the Damascene public while his career included a long series of confrontations with the authorities involving official investigations and imprisonments. Nevertheless, it is fair to state that his public life displayed “a structural disposition to cooperate with the state... that is the keynote of his political thought”.\footnote{Ibid, p. 150.} Ibn Taymiyyah is much discussed today by observers of Jihadists on account of his restrictive understanding of “combative struggle [jihaḍ]”, since he taught that Islam was spread by the sword against non-Muslims, that jihaḍ was never viewed as merely defensive warfare but refers solely to obligatory fighting [qītal, and that the “Fighting Verses” of the Qurʾān (Q 9:5 and 2:216) indeed abrogated all other verses concerning peaceful relations with non-Muslims. (All these points were controversial and violate the normative consensus of Sunnism.)\footnote{See the overview in our monograph Jihad: Peaceful-Striving & Combative-Struggle.} An Egyptian engineer Muhṣammad ‘Abd al-Salām Faraj, founder and “amīr” in 1979 of a small political commune in Cairo named “Islamic Jihaḍ” that united three militant groups into one by the early 1980s called “The Jihaḍ Organization [Tanzim al-Jihaḍ]” produced a manifesto for militant Islamists entitled The Absent Duty [al-Farāḍīyah al-Gha’ibah]. In his booklet ‘Abd al-Salām Faraj recycled Sayyid Qutb’s claim that certain Muslims could be declared kafrūn—including those rulers who abuse Islam for political legitimacy (the doctrine of takfiʿr). Faraj inflated this to assert the status of unjust rulers as equivalent to apostates deserving death, and urged immediate internal jihaḍ against the Egyptian government as an “individual obligation” upon all Muslims capable of fighting. The goal was to establish an Islamic regime by violent means. Faraj argued (invoking Ibn Taymiyyah) that Islam was indeed spread by the sword against non-Muslims, that jihaḍ was never viewed as merely defensive warfare, but refers to fighting [qitaʿ] which is obligatory, and that the Fighting Verses abrogated all other verses inculcating peaceable conduct. It was his Jihaḍ Organization which assassinated Egyptian President Anwar al-Sadat on 6 October 1981. More importantly, Ibn Taymiyyah’s writings have enjoyed a revival in popularity and influence in recent decades because of their growing centrality for the Wahhabi branch of Hanbalite Traditionalism in Najd with its ubiquitous imprint now found in many Muslim societies; although Wahhabi Hanbalism began really amplifying and promoting ideas adapted from Ibn Taymiyyah during the 19th century.

However, our mentioning Ibn Taymiyyah is due to his pugnacious and vituperative attacks on a variety of rationalist disciplines cultivated by Muslims, in particular his zeal to combat what he saw to be an insidious conspiracy against the true Islam of the salaf (first Jewish and Magian, now Greek and Shiʿite esotericist [baṭṭaṣin]) which he equated with Shiʿite deviations, Sufi theosophic teachings, and Hellenizing philosophy; different faces of the same despised enemy. The old animosity of Traditionalist Hanbalism against the Muʿtazilah and then the Ashʿaryyah was also thrown into his spiteful mix, fanning the flames of controversy and flinging accusations of un-faith. His aggressively strident polemics displayed the zeal of narrow Traditionalism with its abhorrence for all unattested innovatory interpretations not ascribed to the salaf. The reality was that his iconoclastic ideas made minimal impact upon his own school outside of a few disciples, notably Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyyah (d. 751/1350) and the jurist Shams al-Dīn b. Mufliḥ (d. 763/1361).

In sharp contrast, Ibn Taymiyyah’s contemporary Damascene Hanbalite jurist Najm al-Dīn al-Tūfī (d. 716/1316) favoured Ashʿarite theology and love of the Prophet’s Family [tashayyuʿ ḥasan], and was publicly reprimanded and imprisoned for these views. Tūfī made a novel contribution by elaborating the notion of “public interest [maslahah]" in legal theory, arguing for the supremacy of public good and public interest among the sources of law on the basis of the solitary Prophetic tradition “Do not inflict injury or repay one injury with another”. Tūfī’s understanding was that “public interest” overrides Consensus as well as the two other primary sources of law, Qur‘ān and Sunnah, in keeping with the Shari‘ah’s primary goal of aversion of harm when promoting the general wellbeing of the community. His idea was ignored until the 20th century when maslahah was retrieved as a pivot around which legal reform may revolve.122

While parts of Ibn Taymiyyah’s thinking was radically innovative, it had little real relevance for the later Ḥanbalite community in Damascus and Palestine. Although Syrian Ḥanbalism continued to harbour a die-hard Ḥāshwi wing, its centre-of-gravity had shifted irrevocably in the direction of the Sunni mainstream. It remained a minority school in Damascus, Jerusalem and Cairo and little changed under the rule of Ottoman sultans (922–1337/1516–1918). At the turn of the 19th/20th century late Ottoman Syria experienced conflicting currents arising out of reactions to the Ottoman Reform movement. This period saw the rise of Arabism, as well as a significant group of salafi reformist ‘ulama led by thinkers such as Jamaal al-Dīn al-Qasimi—who did draw upon ideas of Ibn Taymiyyah), and several Ḥanbalite scholars were associated with his movement.

Wahhabism. Ḥanbalism was already established in Najd (eastern-central Arabia) by the 9th/15th century amidst a tribal society whose individuals owed much more to Bedouin folk customs than to the Islam practised in urban centres. Arab tribal desert life had changed little since the days of the Prophet, and in certain respects resembled the ancient pre-Islamic past.123 Muḥammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab (b. 1703 C.E.- d. 1206/1792), the local Ḥanbalite scholar of the small Najdi oasis of Ḥuraymila viewed the religious and social practices of the nominal Muslims in his environment as akin to polytheism and thus an appropriate target to combat by jihaḍ. His intellectual formation was fairly inclusive in terms of the normative middle-

---

122 Hallaq, History of Islamic Legal Theories, p. 150–153.
123 Consult the detailed study of 20th century tribal life by Jibrail S. Jabbur, The Bedouins and the Desert: Aspects of Nomadic Life in the Arab East, trans. Lawrence Conrad (Albany, State University of New York Press, 1995); and the unique early 20th century travel-geographic writings of the truly great Czech explorer Alois Musil who was made blood-brother to the Chief of the Shamma‘.
ground of Hanbalism, and many of his views reflect his role as a zealous religious reformer “the essence of which was to pit against polytheism a political dominance created by military force”. In 1158/1745, he concluded a religio-political alliance with Muhammad b. Sa’ud (d. 1179/1765), chief of the larger Najdi oasis al-Dir’iyah. From this pact arose the militant Wahhabi movement in symbiosis with a succession of nascent Sa’udi states unfolding over the course of the following two centuries. (The label Wahhabi is a designation by outsiders, for they denominate themselves as “true-monotheists [muwahhidun]” and conceive of their Islam as total conformity with the Qur’an, Sunnah and doctrines of the Salaf.) “Hanbalism was now cast in the unfamiliar role of a doctrine of state-formation in a near-stateless tribal society, and in this role it functioned as the political ideology of three successive Sa’udi states.”

David Commins observes: “It is common for writers on Muhammad ibn Abd al-Wahhab to assert that he sought a social renewal of Arabia, but that characterization is never given specific substance, unless one considers ritual correctness and moral purity to constitute such renewal.” The main vices which early Wahhabi zealots sought to stamp out were absence from prayer, tobacco smoking and music.

The essence of the early Wahhabi movement lay in fighting polytheism and laxity in religious observance through achieving political dominance by military force, conceived as a jihad. In the most critical phase of its history, the modern Sa’udi state was realized by the skill and energy of ‘Abd al-‘Aziz ibn Sa’ud (rg. 1319-1373/1902-1952) who conquered the Hijaz (central west Arabia, where the cities of Makkah and al-Madina are situated) in 1343-4/1924-5 and secured the foundations of the present Sa’udi Kingdom. ‘Abd al-‘Aziz (the descendant of

---

124 Cook, Commanding Right, p. 174. See the summary of Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab’s theological and legal work by N. J. Delong-Bas, Wahhabi Islam: From Revival and Reform to Global Jihad, pp. 41-121. She asserts that he was not particularly indebted to the precedents or to extreme views espoused by Ibn Taymiyyah nor his pupil Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyyah; pp. 108-109, 247-256. Delong-Bas’ book is subtly apologetic in approach, aiming to remove any stigma of the excesses of 20th century Wahhabism from its founder; her research was funded by the King Abdul al-Aziz Foundation for Research and Archives. For an explicitly apologetic view, see J.-D. Zarabozo, The Life, Teachings and Influence of Muhammad Ibn Abdul-Wahhab, with sections on his “opponents and criticisms” & “recent English literature” on Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab, pp. 192-264, 268-308.

Muḥammad b. Saʿūd) preserved the religio-political alliance with the descendants of Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab. Today Aṣḥaṣb [the Family of Saʿūd] rule as monarchs while Aṣḥaṣb [the Family of the Sheikh] control and lead the informal guild of religious authorities and officials who enforce the teachings of the Saʿūdī Hanbalite school as interpreted and applied by Wahhabism; the present chief mufti heading the religious hierarchy is a fifth-generation descendant: Shaykh ‘Abd al-ʿAzīz bin ʿAbdullāh bin Muḥammad bin ʿAbd al-Lāṭif bin ʿAbd al-Rahmān ibn Muḥammad ibn Abd al-Wahhab. The intrepid Englishman H.S. Philby in his travels around the end of the First World War described the descendants of Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab as constituting “a recognized state hierarchy with its headquarters at Riyadh”, responsible for training and directing missionaries (muḥāwīs/lit. ‘enforcers’) sent out to instruct the Bedouin. A contemporary observer, the reputable Arabist professor V. Oliveti remarks of the present-day role of Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab’s descendants:

They are very much married into the Saudi Royal family and are second in prestige only to them in Saudi Arabia. This is a deliberate Saudi tactic, for they use them and their prestige amongst rank and file Wahhabis as a front through which to run the religious establishment. Indeed, the Ministry of Justice, the Ministry of Religious Affairs, the National Mufti and the Head of the Daʿwa Organization (and a number of other posts such as Head of Royal Protocol) are all but hereditary in the Aṣḥaṣbī Family. They are thus extremely loyal to the Saudis.

These two families provide the leading religious and political leadership of the Saudi Kingdom, while shifting dynamics in their uterine relationship shall probably determine the social and political shape of the Kingdom’s future. Yet this is not a parasitic relationship, since both families in this alliance derive mutual benefits,

---

127 Due to an ignorance of Arabic, many journalists, policy experts or would-be experts frequently confuse the title ‘Family’[Aṣḥaṣb] with the article ‘the’[al-] prefixed to nouns treated as definite; most ruling Gulf monarchs or emirs are denominated thus after their eponymous ancestor or founder, e.g. Aṣḥaṣbī of Kuwait, Aṣḥaṣbī of Dubai.

129 Vincenzo Oliveti, Terror’s Source: The Ideology of Wahhabi-Salafism and its Consequences, p. 57 n.1. He further comments (p. 58): “... the Saudi Royal Family has the same nervous relationship with the Wahhabi movement that a civilian government has with a restive military which is nominally under it, but which it fears, and which it cannot control except through placation and funding.”
although anxiety and tensions have certainly increased in the post–September 11th 2001 era with the more visible profile of social and political reformists.

We will not prolong this overview by examining the influence and ideology of the contemporary Sa’udi religous establishment, but wish to draw attention to the state-friendly character of Wahhabi Hanbalism and its consequences, a characteristic feature of medieval Baghdadi Hanbalism here transformed in the Arabian environment. Furthermore, there is the current Sa’udi system of “committees for commanding right and forbidding wrong [hay’at al-amr bi-l-ma’ru’ wa l-nahy ‘an al-munkar]” which institutionalizes the official duty of moral puritanism through enforcers appointed by the religious establishment to supervise public morality and enforce collective prayers. These committees were first set up in Makkah in 1345/1926—after the Wahhabi conquest of the Hijaz from the Ottoman puppet Hashimite sharifs, and destruction of the tomb of the Prophet Muhammad in Madinah—although informal efforts by aggressive members of the Ikhwan or troops of ‘Abd al-‘Aziz Ibn Sa’udi towards the local Makkani population and foreign pilgrims were evidenced before that time. Then they were rapidly extended to the rest of the Sa’udi state with greater centralization, and in recent decades display the trend of general bureaucratization of the role of Wahhabi religious authorities. This institution is partially reminiscent of the intrusive Hanbalite activism of the classical period—with its violation of the well-established traditional Islamic value of privacy rights (to be safeguarded without spying or prying) that placed clear limits on unwarranted interference—yet its formal institutionalization under the Sa’udi hereditary monarchy has no real precedent in Islam, with the possible exception of the office of hisbah in various times and places charged with market supervision and safeguarding urban public morals. A string of severe abuses against ordinary citizens perpetrated by members of these committees in recent years, leading in some instances to death or injury, has drawn international attention to this official institution for “forbidding wrong” and its encouraging an intrusive mode of overbearing vigilantism. These abuses have also focused the attention of the Sa’udi 130 King ‘Abd al-‘Aziz had an uneasy relationship with his own military bands of the Ikhwan: “In 1928 they tried to oust even him, but he defeated them at the famous battle of Sabila, and thereupon put to death a number of their more radical leaders who were responsible for wanton murder and sedition”; Oliveti, Terror’s Source, p. 58 n. 3.

131 Consult e.g. Cook, Commanding Right, index s.v.
people upon the near-inviolable status of Ak al-Shaykh (the descendants of Muhammad ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab who lead the religious establishment and head various ministries) in their unique symbiosis with the ruling monarchy.

The attention of security experts and intelligence agencies concerned to uncover sources of funding and recruitment for Jihadists both within and outside of Arabia is now focused on the claimed sinister role and ideology of the Wahhabi religious establishment. The religious hierarchy is well known to oppose any move toward constitutional parliamentary government as un-Islamic, and harbours revulsion toward insidious secular forces seeping into Muslim societies, whether economic, political, cultural and moral.\(^\text{132}\) This is a closed world turned in upon itself and does not welcome scrutiny. Neither do they easily welcome attempts at control or reform from the ruling Ak Saud, who are concerned above all with continuing their hold on power and wealth while navigating the tempests raging about them in their region, as well as averting the threat of Western secularist mores from their conservative Islamic society, in order to preserve the character and stability of the extended family as its bedrock social institution.

In the Kingdom today, government expenditures outstrip revenues augmenting a trend to indebtedness that started in the 1990s, combined with social dislocations brought by rapid modernization and rampant population growth (the majority of the population is under the age of 15); a shrinking middle-class, falling household incomes, decaying infrastructure, and a decline in social services. At the same time since 2003, the Saudi Family has been combating a persistent indigenous jihadist terror current within their Kingdom. The more reactionary intransigent ‘ulama maintain a measure of popular support—in the opinion of some they may even outnumber the more progressive establishment religious authorities, but this is uncertain—particularly among under-employed and un-employed youth with few skills marketable in the modern \[^\text{132}\] Zarabozo comments forcefully: "...the greatest reason for the West's hatred of 'Wahhabism' is that 'Wahhabism' is the greatest force keeping the Muslims from reinterpreting their faith—actually losing their faith—to make it completely compatible with the Western way of life, capitalization and globalization. True Muslims who believe in the ultimate and timeless authority of the Quran and Sunnah will forever stand up for their rights. ...they have something to offer the rest of the world: the true teachings of God, as opposed to the nothingness and spiritual emptiness that the materialists have spread." Life, Teachings and Influence, p. 206. Further, examine the topics, mode of discourse, strident polemics and thoroughgoing literal textualism exemplified in websites such as salafimanhaj.com maintained by a group of UK Muslims; here one finds all major themes and epistemology associated with Hashwi Hanbalism alive and flourishing.

economy. There are recent signs of concern within significant circles of the Saudi Family to meet the increasing voices for reform and liberalization at least halfway, amidst calls from intellectuals and opinion makers to end the privileged relationship it maintains with the conservative clergy and to negotiate a fresh basis for nationalist identity. Several milestones toward this possible path, said to emanate from King ‘Abdullah b. ‘Abd al-‘Aziz himself, were the 2005 elections for municipal councils; the two Conventions for National Dialogue held in June and December 2003 in Makkah and Riyadh involving prominent intellectuals and clerics from various segments of Saudi society (including women). These Conventions were in response to publicized petitions asking for the public election of the Consultative Council (Majlis al-Shura), social justice, civil and religious rights, an end to corruption, an independent and reformed judiciary, the creation of human rights institutions and economic diversity, as well as freedom of speech, assembly and association. They urged an end to discrimination and fanatic sectarianism promoting hatred: especially towards Imamites in Qatif, al-Hasa and Madinah; Isma'ilites in Najran; as well as Sunnis and Shafi'ites in the western provinces. These appeals were couched in terms of negotiating a more adequate social contract and appeals to mutual interests, implicitly evoking anxiety over the direction entrenched reactionary Wahhabism is taking society. Yet things move slowly and rival sections of the Family of Sa’ud hold differing views about the pace or the need for change. Toby Jones remarks: “While some of the Al Saud do appear to be encouraging progressive change in public, there are also clear warning signs that meaningful reform will be sacrificed on the altar of the family’s internal power struggle.”

Before leaving the Kingdom of the “Guardian of the Two Sacred Sanctuaries” (khalid al-‘haramayn) (the recently self-designated title of the Sa’udi King), it should be emphasized that the future status of the intimate symbiosis of religious and political authority between Wahhabi-religious authorities and the authoritarian Sa’udi monarchy is subject to much speculation and rumor, but little firm knowledge. Unfolding tensions between internal pressures for change emanating from within, and the external geostrategic requirements in the region of Saudi Arabia’s ally the U.S., in tangent with the demonstrated sympathies of certain Wahhabi-religious leaders toward jihadist notions and activities—has led to the definite loss of a measure of the Wahhabi’s domestic credibility. This places a large question mark over the continuation of the Wahhabi monopoly on the religious culture of the Kingdom, or even their diminishing ability to adequately prop up the legitimacy of the Saudi monarchy. From the perspective of inducing socio-political and economic stability in Southwest Asia and North Africa, and for the sake of first neutralizing, then rolling back trans-national Jihadism within a large number of Muslim societies around the globe, the security and stability of the Saudi Kingdom must be maintained, and the Family of Sa’u’d be intelligently assisted and encouraged in weaning themselves from their suffocating embrace of the Family of the Sheikh. As V. Oliveti states:\textsuperscript{134}

---

The only people capable of quietly and seamlessly checking and moderating Salafism [i.e. radical trans-national neo-Traditionalism] are the Saudis themselves, not only because they sit atop of the hierarchy of many of the institutes that propagate Salafism, but because they have the best knowledge of them and the longest experience with them. ... Thus there is no alternative to the Saudis.

In other words, a re-alignment of forces between these two powerful Families needs to occur before one may realistically expect to uproot the tree whose roots we have been digging out, over nearly a millennium and a half of persistent growth.

Nor should one ignore the tremendous shock the monarchy experienced in 1400/1979, when the self-styled mahdi Juhayman al-‘Utaybi led a rabble of mainly Najdi extremists and seized the Makkan sanctuary as a Wahhabi protest against corruption and injustices by the royal family; almost every one of them died fighting after the King enlisted the assistance of (non-Muslim) French Foreign Legion troops to flush them out.\textsuperscript{135} Finally, recall the regicide of King Faysal ibn ‘Abd al-‘Aziz in 1395/1975, shot point blank by his half-brother’s son; while the perpetrator was \textsuperscript{134} Terror’s Source, pp. 101 & 103. Almost every sober well-informed observer of the Kingdom has come to a similar conclusion; the more active and responsible role Saudi Arabia is playing in its region, including distancing itself from too close a stance to the American colossus, is encouraging.

\textsuperscript{135} I know this from my elder brother Kenneth G. Crow who was drafted to work as a MASH nurse outside Makkah patching up their wounds, during his employment with the Whittaker Corporation at a military base hospital in Ta’buk.
declared insane and executed, and popular Arab gossip ascribed the deed to the C.I.A. in revenge for the Sa’udi oil boycott after the 1967 Israeli-Arab war, certain rumors lay responsibility upon A’l al-Shaykh for obscure motives related to Faysal’s determination to introduce television into the Kingdom.\(^{136}\)

However, from the historical perspective of the evolution of Hanbalism, it is evident that the Wahhabi experience of political alliance with the Saudi hereditary monarchy, jihad against polytheism through military conquest, and unyielding pervasive doctrinal monopoly and social-political control, represents a genuine innovation and departure from the past—unless one reverts to the early Umayyad era. With its formal bureaucratic structure subsidized by generous state support (including salaried appointments) and control over a number of ministries, combined with a monopoly over religious education in universities, madrasahs and schools, and tight control over mosque administration exercised by the present religious establishment,\(^{137}\) the Wahhabi mode of Hanbalism outstrips anything witnessed before in Hanbalite history. The reasons for this exceptional achievement may be peculiar to its Arabian tribal context and historical circumstances. One might delve into the perceived necessity of jihad against semi-pagan Bedouin practices\(^{138}\) and perceived reprehensible innovations prolonged from the past in surrounding Muslim societies which Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab and his successors so vigorously pursued, and also scrutinize his own self-image as akin to a second prophet Muhammad. At the same time one would have to screen out the evident tendency toward glorification of Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab and the magnification of his significance clearly manifest in the thought and work of his contemporary apologists. His tomb in al-Diriyah is currently being restored to cater for visitors—in stark contrast with the demolishing of the tomb of Muhammad in 1925.

\(^{136}\) Interview in June 1999, with Ambassador James Aikens, former U.S. ambassador to Saudi Arabia.

\(^{137}\) The loosely-defined leadership of today’s neo-Wahhabi global network is based in Riyadh in the Idaraat Hay’at al-Buhuth wa l-Da’wah wa l-’Irshad, generally called simply Hay’at al-Da’wah [The Missionary Organization], along with its self-funded proxy the Jam’iyyat Ihya’al-Turath of Kuwait, and its international faces Ra’bitat al-‘A’lam al-Islami [The Muslim World League] (established in 1962) and the World Organization of Muslim Youth. Its specific interface with the Saudi government is in the Ministry of Islamic Affairs, Endowments, Da’wah and Guidance.

\(^{138}\) For Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab’s own understanding of jihad, see Delong-Bas, Wahhabi Islam, pp. 193–227; she asserts that later Wahhabi adoption of ideas of Ibn Taymiyyah re-shaped the original doctrine taught by the founder. Further, see Cook, Commanding Right, p. 178 n. 92.
Mainstream Sunni critics of Wahhabism are wont to compare it to the earliest sectarian innovation which first appeared among Muslims during the caliphate of ‘Ali before the middle of the 1st century H: the unruly fractious tribesmen of Kharijite “secessionists” who opposed all power possessors, rejected the larger community and preached jihad upon the totality of Muslims for their alleged un-faith (kufr), killing them as apostates with self-righteous impunity. They were neither Sunni nor Shi‘ite but a third grouping, rejecting the caliphate by Quraysh. One such early Kha‘rijite puritanical group arose out of Najd led by Najdhah b. ‘Amir (d. 73/692), thus known as the Najdiyyah or al-Najada, and for a short time in the early Umayyad era, controlled a large area in Yamamah (the eastern section of the plateau of Najd) and the historical coastal province of Bahrain. However, the Najdiyyah became less rigid and violent than their ideological brethren, condemning the rest of the community of Muslims as mere hypocrites and even practising cautionary-dissimulation [taqiyyah] for self-protection. Despite their propensity for takfir, historically the Khawarij groups were certainly not state-friendly and their religious dogma never entertained co-existence with, nor active support of, any unjust ruler. Rather, in terms of religious doctrine and legal rite, the Arabian Wahhabi form of Islam within Saudi Arabia, Qatar and Kuwait is Hanbalite (whose juridical system is formally acknowledged to be the ‘constitution’ of the Saudi Kingdom), while their ideological affinity is clearly recognizable as harmonious with the purist strain of unyielding Traditionalism embodied in the Ḥashwi mentality.

Conclusion

While we have been tracing out the physiognomy of radical Sunni Traditionalism in its most impervious form, it has become clear that “Ḥashwiyyah” refers not to a specific well-defined school but to a definite orientation having a core doctrinal basis rooted in Sunni–Traditionalist Ḥadith circles whose “theology” and “legal theory” (if these notions may be employed very loosely) was centred on a narrow reductionist literalism embracing anthropomorphic and determinist views. Their “theology” consisted of basic creed (‘aqidah, later transformed into the more systematic

---

139 The only surviving Kha‘rijites are the Ibadis, who in the early Islamic period, controlled the commerce in Berber slave girls from North Africa to the East, then established the early medieval Rustamid dynasty in Algeria, and presently are dominant in the Sultanate of Oman with pockets in Libya, Algeria and Zanzibar. Doctrinally, the Ibadis reject a physical eyewitnessing of God in the Hereafter, and hold the Qur’an to be created.
usul al-din conveyed through Ḥadīth, namely a narrative-theology;¹⁴⁰ and their jurisprudence focused upon deploying revealed Scripture and the vast ocean of narrative traditions guided by their own legalist text-based tradition and creedal preoccupations. Not for them the elaborately technical argumentation of the mutakallimu (rationalist theologians), nor the sophisticated methodological analyses of usulis (legal theorists)—but the blinding clarity and overwhelming evidence of “God says!” and “God’s Messenger said…”. We saw that the early Ḥanbali law school differed in a fundamental aspect from almost all other schools by its deep suspicion of reason and insistence upon legal textualism, and by its creedal purity and active hostility to sectarian “innovations”—the one exception being the Zāhirite school which became defunct. Nevertheless, it bears repeating that respectful debate and sincere exchange of views, not imposed uniformity by scorning or suppression of the Other, always was the religious and historical norm in the history of Islamic thought.

Yet the later “Ḥashwiyyah” were not confined to Ḥanbali Traditionalism alone, and it is probably accurate to state that over the centuries, they came to include the most rigid conservative elements among Mālikī and Shafi’ī Traditionalists. (The Ḥanafi law school was, from its inception, strongly oriented toward rationalism, and many Mu’tazilites were Ḥanafite in their legal rite.)¹⁴⁶ Nor should one assume that a Ḥashwi-like mentality was peculiar to extremist Sunni Traditionalism, and that other branches of Islam never experienced comparable patterns of intellectual impoverishment wedded to doctrinal fanaticism. While the dominant trend in contemporary Imamī Shi’ism remains the rationally oriented Usuli school which still cultivates profound philosophic and metaphysical concerns,¹⁴¹ a parallel form of textual literalism once flourished several centuries ago and persists today known as the Akhbari school which privileges sacred texts over rationalist legal methods (currently present in the Ahwaz region of S.W. Iran, and Bahrain). Perhaps it is not an accident of history that the largest legal rite today among Sunni Muslims both in ¹⁴⁰ By “narrative theology” we mean propounding doctrine by means of narrating Ḥadīth reports constructed to convey the theological position being taught or defended, and/or to condemn those particular doctrines being rejected or condemned. Many early traditions were put into circulation for precisely this purpose.

---

¹⁴¹ Aḥmad ibn al-Ḥusayn ibn Abī l-Ḥusayn Ruḥalla K humaynī (d. 1409/1989) was versed in the gnostic-metaphysical discipline of ‘irfan; under former president Khatemi, the Islamic Republic of Iran promoted international symposia honoring the Ṣafavid-era gnostic-sage Mulla Ṣadra Ṣhirazi (d. 1050/1640) whose official portrait on posters at these symposia bore an uncanny resemblance to Khumayni himself.
numbers and geographic presence is the Ḥanafite, while the smallest is the Ḥanbalite (confined primarily to Syria and the Arabian peninsula).

However, the small footprint of contemporary Ḥanbalism makes a deep imprint by virtue of the weight of Arabian petro-wealth, financing far-flung global activities yielding a ubiquitous presence in many Muslim societies. The contemporary spread of what is often termed “Salafism”—that is to say, neo-Wahhabi religio-cultural ideology—exhibits definite characteristics rooted in the ancient Ḥāshwi mindset and world view. There is the same suspicion or even abhorrence of innovatory heresy (especially toward Shi’ism, Sufism, and all rational theological and philosophic pursuits); the one-dimensional literalist textuality with its denial of symbolic meaning yielding anthropomorphism; the over-zealous religious enforcing leading to abusive intrusion of privacy; and (in Saudi Arabia, and the former Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan under the Taliban) a reciprocal symbiosis with the power of the state over which it imposes doctrinal purity and social control. The tree is nourished through its roots from nutrients locked into the soil well over a millennium ago, and the sands of Najd proved fertile for its growth. Nevertheless, extremist Sunni Traditionalism by itself does not sufficiently account for the contemporary phenomenon of trans-national terror perpetrated by deviant Muslims.

A characteristic hallmark of the contemporary Jihadist mindset is their monodimensional literalist readings of scripture, aided by their intellectual training and scientific educational backgrounds and qualifications (many are engineers, while Zawāhirī is a medical doctor). Such a this-worldly actualization of the mythic or \[\text{\footnotesize{142}}\] The virus of this ongoing deformation spreads by attaching to local hosts exhibiting inherent qualities congenial to its growth, infecting existing Muslim groups already embedded in societies. Most are not violent in the least, but can and at times do serve as half-way homes toward full-fledged takfiri Jihadism. These include: the puritanical reformist Deoband movement of India and its extension in the UK; the Arab world’s Muslim Brotherhood with its offshoots in the Hamas parties of Palestine and Algeria; in Jordan’s largest political party the Islamic Action Front; in the islamist parties of Kuwait and Yemen; expatriot Muslims working in Arabia and the Gulf; various groups in Indonesia, China, Afghanistan, Central Asia, Bangladesh, Turkey, the Caucasus, Europe, and east & west Africa; and the flourishing Ḥamāṣatu l-Ṭabligh of simple-minded itinerant preachers (founded by two Khandalawi scholars in 1926 in India & 1947 in Pakistan).

\[\text{\footnotesize{143}}\] See e.g. Oliveti, Terror’s Source, pp. 21–43, ‘Salafi Ideology, Doctrines and Tenets’. More detailed documentation for this requires a separate study. There is now an increasing counter-ideology by prominent Saudi Wahhabites consciously distancing their school from the excesses of violent Jihadist movements, through condemning the deviant practice and wrong thinking of the ideological children of the Muslim Brotherhood coloured by semi-revolutionary & anarchic ideas of Sayyid Qutb—groups whom they label Ḥaqqawi and Qutbi; see e.g. ‘Abd al-Salam b. Sālim al-Shaymi, Fikr al-Irḥāb wa l-ʻUnf fil-Mamlakat l-ʻArabiyyah al-Saʿudiyyah [Ideology of Terrorism and Violence in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia].
symbolic discourse found in the sacred texts, represents in reality a form of intellectual secularization. The literal textuality of their handling of revealed texts contrasts starkly with the nuanced inter-textualism and hierarchical modes of meaning exemplified in normative Muslim classical readings. This “flat” attitude springs from their spurning the traditional modes of rationality tied to a hierarchy of cognitive faith and insight. The Jihadist naïve utopian view that Islam is an essentialist inflexible system that instructs its adherents in mass civilian killing and suicidal terrorism, is built upon myths of past glory and anger over present humiliations, while simultaneously rooted in European notions ultimately imbibed from the Counter-Enlightenment and from revolutionary anarchism—being in actuality, as John Gray succinctly stated, “a typical modern hybrid”.

The Ḥāshwiyyah or ignoramuses were exoteric literalists, apprehending merely the surface meaning of words and concepts due to their inability or refusal to penetrate beyond the literal meaning for apprehending deeper significance. Their motto bi-la-kayf [Without Asking How] discloses a mode of religious perception wherein the exterior form is deemed sacred in and by itself, requiring suspension of any active comprehension of meaning the form may disclose or mediate to our conceptual and imaginative faculties. This type of reductionist externalizing operates a slavish obedience to the factual, spurning all apprehension of higher symbolic meaning: the pointing finger is merely a finger, what is pointed to remains unrecognized and non-apprehended. The early Kufan scholar Sa‘ið b. Jubayr (executed 95/714) hit the mark when he said: “He who reads the Qur’ān and then does not interpret it is like a blind man or a Bedouin!” This mentality embodies a shallow mode of surface understanding that may justly be characterized as cognitive idolatry. It is akin to one who views his face in a mirror and imagines his face to be embedded within the mirrored surface; or one who views a representative symbol of divinity and perceives this object itself to be the very divinity being worshiped. The 20th century thinker Idris Shah observed:

---

144 For the epistemic basis of this mindset, see our “Kalashnikov Islam” and the Deformist Mentality”.

145 Cited by Rosenthal, from Ibn Jarir al-Ṭabarī’s Tafsīr (Bulaq, 1323–1329) I, p. 28. Ibn Jubayr was a pupil of the influential Qur’ānic exegete and cousin of the Prophet, ‘Abdallāh b. ‘Abbaṣ and was executed by the Umayyad governor of Iraq, al-Hāfaṣ b. Yūsf for participating in the failed revolt of Qur’ān readers led by Ibn al-As’āfḥ. Shah was an initiate of the Naqshbandī Order, heir to the teachings of the Central Asian Khwaṣṣān /‘Masters of Wisdom’.

146 Neglected Aspects of Sufi Study (London, Octagon Press, 1977), p. 15. Shah was an initiate of the Naqshbandī Order, heir to the teachings of the Central Asian Khwaṣṣān /‘Masters of Wisdom’.
The very human desire for consistency, reassurance, certainty—causes people to seek, almost to crave, single, definite, very often over-simplified formulae: not as instruments or vehicles of learning, but as ‘truths’. … What has happened is that the individual, whose need for mental stabilization may be stronger than his desire for truth, attaches himself to so-called principles not originally intended to be such.

While this mentality occurs in all religious traditions in accordance with an inherent human limitation varying among individuals in dissimilarity—a truth well known and discussed by Muslim sages in the past—its most virulent Muslim expression consists of intense emotional adherence to outward appearance, blended with active hostility towards all deeper intellectual and/or symbolic cognitions. Others not sharing such flat one-dimensional perception must be constrained to adopt it, while their symbolic and hierarchic representations of inner meaning must be suppressed.

The underlying epistemological defect lies in the failure of perceptive imagination to mediate or to disclose higher apprehensions, thus the pejorative label “ignoramuses” along with associations of “unruly rabble” conveying the regression associated with large-group identity. This failure is clearly seen in key points of their dogma: the physical vision of God [ru’yah], and God’s pre-existing incrate “Word” [kalimah]. God is conceived to be perceptible in the physical world in an anthropomorphic manner: held to descend to our world on the clouds accompanied by the angels (Q Baqarah 2:210 … fi>z}ulal‘in; and c.f. Nah}l 16:2, Qadr 97:4), or to descend at night to the lower heavens to forgive and grant requests. His “Word” communicated to Muhammad as the revealed Qur’Aån is the very utterance of Divinity whose sensible audible and visible letters are divine speech, frozen in Arabic ligatures. It is here—buried in their failure to think critically and grasp significance by moving from the apparent to the real, inducted by the submergence of the individual mind with its innate critical prehension into the encompassing group mind with its uncritical certitude and passionate indulgence in crude self-affirming emotion—when religion becomes inverted and swallowed up by an ignorance, finding easy expression in dogmatic hatred and unthinking violence. The philosopher Ibn Sīnā, known to the Latins as Avicenna (d. 428/1037), might well have remarked: ‘Wrong use of imaginative faculty, with sublimation of higher thinking faculty displaced by lower emotions.’

The challenge facing Muslims today is to present the perennial values and principles of Islam in authentic terms for the 21st century. Thinking Muslims must search for fresh ways to realize and make these values real and effective in our world. The energy and direction for this task must be generated from within, it cannot be imported from without. How may we grasp what is most adequate for this task? How may we enliven creative energy and vision that resonates with the primal values of Islam?

Abū Ḥasan al-Baghdādi, Kitāb al-Funūn, extracts from sole surviving volume edited by Kamīl Muhāmmad al-Kharrābī, Zahr al-Ghūṣīn min Kitāb al-Funūn. Beirut and Damascus: Dar-al-Tawḍīq, 1999. (Original work was over 200 vols.)

Muhāmmad Bāqir al-Mahmūdī (Ed.). Beirut, 1981. (This work is probably identical with al-Iskaḥī's Kitāb al-Tafdiḥāʾ.)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>IDSS Working Paper Series</th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>4. The South China Sea Dispute re-visited</td>
<td>Ang Cheng Guan (1999)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>General Elections</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6. ‘Humanitarian Intervention in Kosovo’ as Justified, Executed and Mediated by NATO:</td>
<td>Kumar Ramakrishna (2000)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Strategic Lessons for Singapore</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10. Explaining Indonesia’s Relations with Singapore During the New Order Period: The Case</td>
<td>Terence Lee Chek Liang (2001)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>of Regime Maintenance and Foreign Policy</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perspective</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Study of Clean Water Supplies in Singapore</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>No.</td>
<td>Title</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-----</td>
<td>-----------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18.</td>
<td>Asian Developing Countries and the Next Round of WTO Negotiations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>a. The Contested Concept of Security</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>b. Security and Security Studies After September 11: Some Preliminary Reflections</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>24.</td>
<td>Democratisation In South Korea And Taiwan: The Effect Of Social Division On Inter-Korean and Cross-Strait Relations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>26.</td>
<td>911, American Praetorian Unilateralism and the Impact on State-Society Relations in Southeast Asia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>27.</td>
<td>Great Power Politics in Contemporary East Asia: Negotiating Multipolarity or Hegemony?</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>29.</td>
<td>International Responses to Terrorism: The Limits and Possibilities of Legal Control of Terrorism by Regional Arrangement with Particular Reference to ASEAN</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>30.</td>
<td>Reconceptualizing the PLA Navy in Post – Mao China: Functions, Warfare, Arms, and Organization</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>32.</td>
<td>11 September and China: Opportunities, Challenges, and Warfighting</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>33.</td>
<td>Islam and Society in Southeast Asia after September 11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>34.</td>
<td>Hegemonic Constraints: The Implications of September 11 For American Power</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
35. Not Yet All Aboard... But Already All At Sea Over Container Security Initiative
   Irvin Lim

36. Financial Liberalization and Prudential Regulation in East Asia: Still Perverse?
   Andrew Walter

37. Indonesia and The Washington Consensus
   Premjith Sadasivan

38. The Political Economy of FDI Location: Why Don't Political Checks and Balances and Treaty Constraints Matter?
   Andrew Walter

39. The Securitization of Transnational Crime in ASEAN
   Ralf Emmers

40. Liquidity Support and The Financial Crisis: The Indonesian Experience
   J Soedradjad Djiwandono

41. A UK Perspective on Defence Equipment Acquisition
   David Kirkpatrick

42. Regionalisation of Peace in Asia: Experiences and Prospects of ASEAN, ARF and UN
   Partnership
   Mely C. Anthony

43. The WTO In 2003: Structural Shifts, State-Of-Play And Prospects For The Doha Round
   Razeen Sally

44. Seeking Security In The Dragon's Shadow: China and Southeast Asia In The Emerging
   Asian Order
   Amitav Acharya

45. Deconstructing Political Islam In Malaysia: UMNO'S Response To PAS' Religio-Political Dialectic
   Joseph Liow

46. The War On Terror And The Future of Indonesian Democracy
   Tatik S. Hafidz

47. Examining The Role of Foreign Assistance in Security Sector Reforms: The Indonesian
   Case
   Eduardo Lachica

48. Sovereignty and The Politics of Identity in International Relations
   Adrian Kuah

49. Deconstructing Jihad; Southeast Asia Contexts
   Patricia Martinez

50. The Correlates of Nationalism in Beijing Public Opinion
   Alastair Iain Johnston

51. In Search of Suitable Positions’ in the Asia Pacific: Negotiating the US-China
    Relationship and Regional Security
   Evelyn Goh
52. American Unilateralism, Foreign Economic Policy and the ‘Securitisation’ of Globalisation

53. Fireball on the Water: Naval Force Protection-Projection, Coast Guarding, Customs Border Security & Multilateral Cooperation in Rolling Back the Global Waves of Terror
    from the Sea
   Irvin Lim (2003)

54. Revisiting Responses To Power Preponderance: Going Beyond The Balancing-Bandwagoning Dichotomy
   Chong Ja Ian (2003)

55. Pre-emption and Prevention: An Ethical and Legal Critique of the Bush Doctrine and Anticipatory Use of Force In Defence of the State

56. The Indo-Chinese Enlargement of ASEAN: Implications for Regional Economic Integration
   Helen E S Nesadurai (2003)

57. The Advent of a New Way of War: Theory and Practice of Effects Based Operation
   Joshua Ho (2003)

    Freedom
   Irvin Lim (2004)

59. Force Modernisation Trends in Southeast Asia
   Andrew Tan (2004)

60. Testing Alternative Responses to Power Preponderance: Buffering, Binding, Bonding and Beleaguering in the Real World
   Chong Ja Ian (2004)

61. Outlook on the Indonesian Parliamentary Election 2004

    Trafficking in East Asia

63. Outlook for Malaysia’s 11th General Election

64. Not Many Jobs Take a Whole Army: Special Operations Forces and The Revolution in Military Affairs.

65. Technological Globalisation and Regional Security in East Asia
   J.D. Kenneth Boutin (2004)

66. UAVs/UCAVs – Missions, Challenges, and Strategic Implications for Small and Medium
    Powers
67. Singapore’s Reaction to Rising China: Deep Engagement and Strategic Adjustment
   Evelyn Goh

68. The Shifting Of Maritime Power And The Implications For Maritime Security In East Asia
   Joshua Ho

   Development On The Lancang Jiang
   Evelyn Goh

70. Examining the Defence Industrialization-Economic Growth Relationship: The Case of Singapore
   Adrian Kuah and Bernard Loo

71. “Constructing” The Jemaah Islamiyah Terrorist: A Preliminary Inquiry
   Kumar Ramakrishna

72. Malaysia and The United States: Rejecting Dominance, Embracing Engagement
   Helen E S Nesadurai

73. The Indonesian Military as a Professional Organization: Criteria and Ramifications for Reform
   John Bradford

74. Maritime Terrorism in Southeast Asia: A Risk Assessment
   Catherine Zara Raymond

75. Southeast Asian Maritime Security In The Age Of Terror: Threats, Opportunity, And Charting The Course Forward
   John Bradford

76. Deducing India’s Grand Strategy of Regional Hegemony from Historical and Conceptual Perspectives
   Manjeet Singh Pardesi

77. Towards Better Peace Processes: A Comparative Study of Attempts to Broker Peace with M NLF and GAM
   S P Harish

78. Multilateralism, Sovereignty and Normative Change in World Politics
   Amitav Acharya

79. The State and Religious Institutions in Muslim Societies
   Riaz Hassan

80. On Being Religious: Patterns of Religious Commitment in Muslim Societies
   Riaz Hassan

81. The Security of Regional Sea Lanes
   Joshua Ho

82. Civil-Military Relationship and Reform in the Defence Industry
   Arthur S Ding

83. How Bargaining Alters Outcomes: Bilateral Trade Negotiations and Bargaining Strategies
   Deborah Elms

84. Great Powers and Southeast Asian Regional Security Strategies: Omni-enmeshment, Balancing and Hierarchical Order
   (2005)

(2004)
85. Global Jihad, Sectarianism and The Madrassahs in Pakistan
   Ali Riaz

86. A utobiography, Politics and Ideology in Sayyid Qutb’s Reading of the Qur’an
   Umej Bhatia

87. Maritime Disputes in the South China Sea: Strategic and Diplomatic Status Quo
   Ralf Emmers

88. China’s Political Commissars and Commanders: Trends & Dynamics
   Srikanth Kondapalli

89. Piracy in Southeast Asia New Trends, Issues and Responses
   Catherine Zara Raymond

90. Geopolitics, Grand Strategy and the Bush Doctrine
   Simon Dalby

91. Local Elections and Democracy in Indonesia: The Case of the Riau Archipelago
   Nankyung Choi

92. The Impact of RMA on Conventional Deterrence: A Theoretical Analysis
   Manjeet Singh Pardesi

93. Africa and the Challenge of Globalisation
   Jeffrey Herbst

94. The East Asian Experience: The Poverty of ‘Picking Winners
   Barry Desker and Deborah Elms

95. Bandung And The Political Economy Of North-South Relations: Sowing The Seeds For Revisioning International Society
   Helen E S Nesadurai

96. Re-conceptualising the Military-Industrial Complex: A General Systems Theory Approach
   Adrian Kuah

97. Food Security and the Threat From Within: Rice Policy Reforms in the Philippines
   Bruce Tolentino

98. Non-Traditional Security Issues: Securitisation of Transnational Crime in Asia
   James Laki

99. Securitizing/Desecuritizing the Filipinos’ ‘Outward Migration Issue’ in the Philippines’
   Relations with Other Asian Governments
   José N. Franco, Jr.

100. Securitization Of Illegal Migration of Bangladeshis To India
    Josy Joseph

101. Environmental Management and Conflict in Southeast Asia - Land Reclamation and its Political Impact
    Kog Yue-Choong

102. Securitizing border-crossing: The case of marginalized stateless minorities in the Thai-
    Burma Borderlands
    Mika Toyota
103 The Incidence of Corruption in India: Is the Neglect of Governance Endangering Human Security in South Asia?
Shabnam Mallick and Rajarshi Sen

104 The LTTE’s Online Network and its Implications for Regional Security
Shyam Tekwani

105 The Korean War June-October 1950: Inchon and Stalin In The “Trigger Vs Justification” Debate
Tan Kwoh Jack

106 International Regime Building in Southeast Asia: ASEAN Cooperation against the Illicit Trafficking and Abuse of Drugs
Ralf Emmers

107 Changing Conflict Identities: The case of the Southern Thailand Discord
S.P. Harish

108 Myanmar and the Argument for Engagement: A Clash of Contending Moralities?
Christopher B Roberts

109 TEMPORAL DOMINANCE
Military Transformation and the Time Dimension of Strategy
Edwin Seah

110 Globalization and Military-Industrial Transformation in South Asia: A Historical Perspective
Emrys Chew

111 UNCLOS and its Limitations as the Foundation for a Regional Maritime Security Regime
Sam Bateman

112 Freedom and Control Networks in Military Environments
Paul T Mitchell

113 Rewriting Indonesian History The Future in Indonesia’s Past
Kwa Chong Guan

114 Twelver Shi’ite Islam: Conceptual and Practical Aspects
Christoph Marcinkowski

115 Islam, State and Modernity: Muslim Political Discourse in Late 19th and Early 20th century India
Iqbal Singh Sevea

Ong Wei Chong

117 “From Counter-Society to Counter-State: Jemaah Islamiyah According to PUPJII”
Elena Pavlova

118 The Terrorist Threat to Singapore’s Land Transportation Infrastructure: A Preliminary Enquiry
Adam Dolnik
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Page</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Year</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>119</td>
<td>The Many Faces of Political Islam</td>
<td>Mohammed Ayoob</td>
<td>2006</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>120</td>
<td>Facets of Shi‘ite Islam in Contemporary Southeast Asia (I): Thailand and Indonesia</td>
<td>Christoph Marcinkowski</td>
<td>2006</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>121</td>
<td>Facets of Shi‘ite Islam in Contemporary Southeast Asia (II): Malaysia and Singapore</td>
<td>Christoph Marcinkowski</td>
<td>2006</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>122</td>
<td>Towards a History of Malaysian Ulama</td>
<td>Mohamed Nawab</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>123</td>
<td>Islam and Violence in Malaysia</td>
<td>Ahmad Fauzi Abdul Hamid</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>124</td>
<td>Between Greater Iran and Shi‘ite Crescent: Some Thoughts on the Nature of Iran’s</td>
<td>Christoph Marcinkowski</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Ambitions in the Middle East</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>125</td>
<td>Thinking Ahead: Shi‘ite Islam in Iraq and its Seminaries (hawzah ‘ilmiiyyah)</td>
<td>Christoph Marcinkowski</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>126</td>
<td>The China Syndrome: Chinese Military Modernization and the Rearming of Southeast Asia</td>
<td>Richard A. Bitzinger</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>127</td>
<td>Contested Capitalism: Financial Politics and Implications for China</td>
<td>Richard Carney</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>129</td>
<td>The De-escalation of the Spratly Dispute in Sino-Southeast Asian Relations</td>
<td>Ralf Emmers</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>130</td>
<td>War, Peace or Neutrality: An Overview of Islamic Polity’s Basis of Inter-State Relations</td>
<td>Muhammad Haniff Hassan</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>131</td>
<td>Mission Not So Impossible: The AMM and the Transition from Conflict to Peace in Aceh,</td>
<td>Kirsten E. Schulze</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>2005–2006</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Terrorism and Sea Piracy</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>133</td>
<td>The Ulama in Pakistani Politics</td>
<td>Mohamed Nawab</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>134</td>
<td>China’s Proactive Engagement in Asia: Economics, Politics and Interactions</td>
<td>Li Mingjiang</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>135</td>
<td>The PLA’s Role in China’s Regional Security Strategy</td>
<td>Qi Dapeng</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>136</td>
<td>War As They Knew It: Revolutionary War and Counterinsurgency in Southeast Asia</td>
<td>Ong Wei Chong</td>
<td>2007</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Indonesia's Direct Local Elections: Background and Institutional Framework
Nankyung Choi
(2007)

Contextualizing Political Islam for Minority Muslims
Mohammad Haniff bin Hassan
(2007)

Ngruki Revisited: Modernity and Its Discontents at the Pondok Pesantren al-Mukmin of Ngruki, Surakarta
Farish A. Noor
(2007)

Globalization: Implications of and for the Modern / Post-modern Navies of the Asia Pacific
Geoffrey Till
(2007)

Comprehensive Maritime Domain Awareness: An Idea Whose Time Has Come?
Irvin Lim Fang Jau
(2007)

Sulawesi: Aspirations of Local Muslims
Rohaiza Ahmad Asi
(2007)

Islamic Militancy, Sharia, and Democratic Consolidation in Post-Suharto Indonesia
Noorhaidi Hasan
(2007)

Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon: The Indian Ocean and The Maritime Balance of Power in Historical Perspective
Emrys Chew
(2007)

New Security Dimensions in the Asia Pacific
Barry Desker
(2007)

Japan’s Economic Diplomacy towards East Asia: Fragmented Realism and Naïve Liberalism
Hidetaka Yoshimatsu
(2007)

U.S. Primacy, Eurasia’s New Strategic Landscape, and the Emerging Asian Order
Alexander L. Vuving
(2007)

The Asian Financial Crisis and ASEAN’s Concept of Security
Yongwook Ryu
(2008)

Security in the South China Sea: China’s Balancing Act and New Regional Dynamics
Li Mingjiang
(2008)

The Defence Industry in the Post-Transformational World: Implications for the United States and Singapore
Richard A. Bitzinger
(2008)

The Islamic Opposition in Malaysia: New Trajectories and Directions
Mohamed Fauz Abdul Hamid
(2008)

Thinking the Unthinkable: The Modernization and Reform of Islamic Higher Education in Indonesia
Farish A. Noor
(2008)

Outlook for Malaysia’s 12th General Elections
Mohamed Nawab Mohamed Osman, Shahirah Mahmood and Joseph Chinyong Liow
(2008)

The use of SOLAS Ship Security Alert Systems
Thomas Timlen
(2008)
Thai-Chinese Relations: Security and Strategic Partnership
Chulacheeb Chinwanno

Sovereignty in ASEAN and the Problem of Maritime Cooperation in the South China Sea
J N Mak

Sino-U. S. Competition in Strategic Arms
Arthur S. Ding

Roots of Radical Sunni Traditionalism
Karim Douglas Crow